LISA AMOWITZ

B_R_E_A_K_I_N_G

GLASS

LISA AMOWITZ

Copyright © 2013 by Lisa Amowitz

Sale of the paperback edition of this book without its cover is unauthorized.

Spencer Hill Press

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is entirely coincidental.

All rights reserved, including the right to reproduce this book or portions thereof in any form whatsoever.

Contact:

Spencer Hill Press, PO Box 247, Contoocook, NH 03229, USA

Please visit our website at www.spencerhillpress.com

First Edition: July 2013.

Lisa Amowitz
Breaking Glass: a novel / by Lisa Amowitz — 1st ed.
p. cm.

Summary:

When the girl he loves disappears, a seventeen-year-old tries to call her back from beyond the grave to solve her own murder.

The author acknowledges the copyrighted or trademarked status and trademark owners of the following wordmarks mentioned in the fiction: Absolut, Advanced Placement, Advil, Arizona Iced Tea, Bluetooth, BMW, C-3PO, C-Leg, Discovery Channel, Doroth, Dracula, Facebook, Frankenstein, Hair Club for Men, History Channel, Hulk, iPhone, Ivy League, Jeep, Jockey, Ken, Lego, Lit League, Lone Ranger, Magic 8 Ball, Manolo Blahnik, Matchbox, Mob Wives, Monday Night Football, Netflix, Old Farme Almanac, Oldsmobile, Otto Bock, Paralympics, Parker Brothers, Phantom of the Opera, Photoshop, Post-it, PowerBar, Ralph Laure Rhode Island School of Design, SATs, Sears, ShopRite, Six Flags, Sleeping Beauty, Sports Authority, Star Wars, Superman, Tin Man Tonto, Vicodin, Volkswagen Jetta, West Side Story, Wii, Wite-Out, Wizard, Yankees, YouTube

Cover design by Lisa Amowitz Interior layout by K. Kaynak

ISBN 978-1-937053-38-3 (paperback) ISBN 978-1-937053-39-0 (e-book)

Printed in the United States of America

For my parents, Gene and Sherry, who nurtured the spark. For my children, Benjamin and Rebecc whom I pass it along, with love.
		whom I pas	ss it along, wi	itii iove.

o n e

Now (November 17th)

Outside the dinner theater lobby, the glow of street lamps barely penetrates the thick mist the shrouds the parking lot. It's the kind of night that Jack the Ripper might have prowled the cobblestoned streets of London searching for victims.

In the lobby, fresh from the standing ovation he's received as Tony in our production of West Sic Story, my best friend Ryan Morgan is surrounded by a crush of people. For two weeks running, he performance has been drawing crowds from all over Westchester County.

I glance around furtively, but no one notices the lighting guy. Truth is, my heart's not in theate I'm only working weekends to pad my college applications, and my wallet. So, I take a minute study the latest text from Susannah Durban, Ryan's girlfriend of three years. Heat creeps into m cheeks.

For the past year, Susannah's been inexplicably texting me with YouTube links to her hauntin stop-action animations. I watch her body drift across the screen draped with filmy gauze, her da bronze hair and golden skin amid floating leaves, graveyards, ballet dancers, Indian goddesses, as scattered words in Hebrew and English, most of which make no sense.

But other than telling me the link is private and to keep it our little secret, Susannah nev mentions them when I see her. Neither do I.

Yet if I could dive into my iPhone and swim beside her, an exotic fish in her private world, would do it and never look back.

And Ryan would kill me. Best friends don't want to do their best friend's girlfriend. I think that written somewhere. So is not cheating on your girlfriend. And so is not ratting him out.

I glance behind me. Ryan is intertwined with Claudia Herman, the community college girl wl plays Maria. Claudia's hot. And she's slept with our whole track team. I think of Susannah, merciful out of town on a college visit.

My phone vibrates. Susannah again. This time it's an actual text.

I clench my jaw and look away from Ryan and his latest fling, sworn to silence by the Guy Code Honor.

Jeremy! guess what. i'm here! got n earlier flight

I peer out into night, then glance at Ryan again. Shit.

Claudia has one leg coiled around Ryan's tall frame, like a boa constrictor. I fumble with me phone. Texting under pressure has never been my strong suit.

Heart pounding, I gulp in air and think of my water bottle, nestled in the glove compartment of n car. I can feel my lips pressed to its cool rim, imagining the warmth of its contents sliding down that back of my throat.

But no. I have to stay sharp. I'm sensible, I tell myself. Sensible Jeremy Glass.

Besides, there's no time. Susannah emerges from the parking lot mist carrying a single red rose. circuit flips on inside me; a familiar volt of current sizzles through my core like heat lightning. I stuthe phone in my pocket and try to position myself to block Ryan from view. My palms are slick.

first, I identify the heaviness behind my eyeballs as guilt. Only as Susannah pushes through the gladoors, droplets beaded on her hair like diamond chips, do I recognize the cold hollow thing that clavup into my throat for what it really is.

Shame.

Panic cramps my insides. The water bottle beckons.

"Jeremy!" Susannah hugs me, smelling of rain and vanilla. She flashes a smile, her clear ey bright, but at the temples her deep golden skin is almost transparent, stretched just a bit too tight. At her raincoat hangs loose. "I thought I should be here for the big night, so I booked an earlier flight she says. "Surprised?"

"A little. I know Ryan certainly will be." I'm buzzing like I've just downed a fifth of Absolut, the damp ache inside me incinerated to ash. The idiotic smile still frozen on my face, I notice a scarl string around her wrist. Buying time, I ask, "What's that?"

Susannah shrugs her bronze curls behind her shoulders. She takes a step closer and tilts her he toward me in a way that causes a shudder to run up my legs.

"It's a souvenir from the Kabbalah fair I stumbled onto this weekend. Can you believe it?" Sl gazes at me as if this bit of information should hold some significance. We are both part Jewish, least in lineage, though Susannah has always been more into the occult. I keep the Magic 8 Ball sl gave me for my fifteenth birthday in a place of honor with the first track medal I won. For me, h fascination with the spiritual realm has always added to her mystique and made me want her all the more. "Oh, the trendy spiritual stuff," I say, stalling for time. "Isn't Madonna into that?"

Susannah narrows her eyes. My heart stutters. The way she looks at me sometimes, I wonder if si sees through the placid mask I've worn all these years. With my hands-on experience, I figure I' probably a more accomplished actor than Ryan is by now, so I should be able to hide how I really fee

But Susannah smiles, roots around in her giant handbag, and hands me a pen with a clear top and little floating carousel horse inside. "Since you made such a stink about Rhode Island having the oldest carousel still in use in America."

"The Flying Horse Carousel. Wow. Thanks, Suze." I pocket the pen and wipe the dampness from my palms. "I love it." I don't mention that I will probably rearrange my shelves to find a special platfor it among the historic relics, personal and otherwise, I collect the way birds gather twigs. It shelves are crammed with artifacts people bring me from their travels: old baseballs, gravestor rubbings, arrowheads, even chunks of brick from buildings where significant events took place.

You don't have to worry about what's going to happen with history.

Because it already happened.

Then it dawns on me. I'd been so wrapped up in the details I'd missed the main point. "Wh happened with your portfolio review at Rhode Island School of Design, Suze? Isn't that why you we in the first place?"

Susannah looks away. "I can't afford that place."

"Can you say scholarship? Your art is amazing," I offer, avoiding mention of her strange by genius animations.

"With my grades?" She smiles and meets my gaze, emotions I can't read flickering in her gree eyes. Her smile falls away. "Besides. I'd never fit in there."

I reach for her hand. "I thought you said your filthy rich half-brother was going to pay. Suze, yo can't just—" I start to say. Until I remember what's happening right now, about twenty feet behind u I'm afraid to look.

"I never went to the interview," she mutters, sniffing the rose.

"Are you kidding?"

Susannah scans the crowd for Ryan. For the past two years, RISD was all Susannah talked abou

She'd trudge every weekend to that portfolio class in the city, just to get ready for it.

"So was he awesome?" she asks brightly.

I swallow hard and try to answer, but my mouth is dry as pavement. Even though it's ripping minsides apart, I'm still covering for Ryan.

"Bet you were great on the lights, Jeremy," Susannah adds quickly. She cranes her neck, trying spot Ryan in the crowd. "So where is he?"

Heart pounding, my mind hiccups through its storehouse of facts. I reposition myself to block h view. There's no time to try texting Ryan a warning.

I could tell Susannah. Tell her how Ryan has been sneaking around behind her back for over year, even hooking up with two college juniors in a motel room during one of our out-of-town meet But defying the Morgan machine by pointing this out would take too much energy. Instead I blue "Did you know the Flying Horse Carousel in Watch Hill was once part of a traveling carnival?"

She laughs and shakes her head. "What? Jeremy, sometimes you can be such a—"

But her voice trails off as her gaze wanders past mine, her smile crumpling like a paper bag follow her line of sight and I know this is it. The crowd has thinned around Ryan, enough for her to s him with his mouth smashed against Claudia's.

"Oh, man," I gasp. I turn to comfort Susannah, but she is already gone.

I stand, dithering, wanting to run after her and apologize for letting her walk into this ambush.

But, no. This is something Ryan needs to take care of. I might have signed on to sweep his me under the rug, but I'll be damned if I'm going to clean up after him. I push through the crowd to get him.

"What? She what? Did you know she was coming back early?"

I feel my face heat. "No."

Ryan pushes a pouting Claudia off him, his stage makeup still glistening and thick, traces Claudia's lipstick smeared on his lips. "Good job, Jeremy. You could have at least texted me."

My hand curls into a fist. I stuff it in my jacket pocket. "She ran out," I say. "Maybe you can catcher."

Ryan shrugs, and without a coat, stalks out of the theater into the night. I wait a few minutes, the follow. Susannah's car is gone, and so is Ryan's. I try to call Susannah, but she doesn't pick up.

I get in my car and focus on resisting the water bottle's siren call, panicked glimpses of making nightmare crashing through the floodgates, the terrifying memories swept through with it. The rain and the torrents of water sweeping past, draining into the Gorge, forcing me to remember. The relive it. No. Not now. I need to stay clear.

Since eighth grade, when I discovered that liquor dulls my terrors, I have been a master thief are spy.

Not even Ryan knows.

Just a sip to calm my shaky nerves. One tiny sip to beat back the rising waters that threaten drown me. I can do it. I pride myself on my steely self-control and my ability to remain stone-co sober, even when the track team holds a victory keg party. They call me Jeremy the Teetotaler, Jerem the History Nerd, who never partakes.

I snap open the glove compartment. The innocuous silver bottle is shoved behind the owner manual, gas receipts, and a collection of PowerBar wrappers. I raise it to my lips and gulp once, twice three times, the cold liquid igniting as it hits my throat. It takes two, three more gulps to slow no heart to normal speed. The bottle is nearly empty. I cap it and return it to the compartment, warm flowing to my sold fingers. I'd need to dripk three times as much as that to lose focus flowing to my cold fingers. I'd need to drink three times as much as that to lose focus.

Swerving through the deserted black roads, slick with rain over the ice, I follow my usual runnin circuit. This is familiar turf. Practically my backyard.

Yes. I can do this. Susannah knows my route, so I hope she's come this way and parked, knowir I'd find her. She wants me to find her. To comfort her. I'll tell her everything. How I'm sorry for lying to her. For letting Ryan hurt her. And maybe, at last, she'll accept that it's not Ryan she wants, but must be but there's no sign of her.

After driving and searching fruitlessly, my mind churning with outcomes, the now-driving rablurring my windshield, I can't stand it anymore. My heart is racing. Just one last sip to fortify myse is all I need.

When I round the next hairpin curve, my headlights flash on Ryan's car parked behind Susannah' both engines running. I squint through the rain and mist and spot them behind the guardra illuminated in the headlamps' cone of light. There's no shoulder on this side of the road, so I pull ov when I can, about twenty yards past them.

When I finally get out of the car, I can hear her shouts over the racket the rain makes. My head buzzing, but my thoughts are clear.

In fact, they've never been clearer, as the roots that entangle me fall away.

The damp air smells like freedom.

Susannah screams, and pounds at Ryan's chest with her fists. He shoves her hard and she fal backward. I don't see her get up again. Raucous arguments are nothing new between Susannah ar Ryan, but I've never seen him hit her before.

There's a steep decline into the woods where they've chosen to have their argument, and I wor Susannah could have gotten hurt. Ryan disappears now, too. What the hell are they doing?

I begin to run at full tilt. I still have some distance to cover, but that's no problem for me, even with the Absolut pumping heat through my veins. But my boot heel catches on a wet leaf and slid out from under me.

I'm flying, but I land softly.

I should have worn my running shoes, I think crazily, then scramble to my feet.

There are blinding lights. The squeal of brakes. Breaking glass.

I don't make it to the other side.

t w

Then

Art class was mandatory freshman year, and I'd spent most of my summer griping about it. preferred to be out running, not cooped in a smelly room with Mr. Wallace, the creepily silent a teacher who looked like an iguana, but with even less personality.

None of my track buddies were in the class with me, so I fidgeted on my stool, trying to figure o a way to get an extra period of gym.

Five minutes after the late bell rang, a bronze-skinned girl with a cloud of hair a shade light flounced in. She wore a tight-fitting black T-shirt and baggy black cargo pants tucked into lace-ucombat boots. Mr. Wallace's iguana-eyes followed her to the empty stool next to me. When she go closer, I could see the tiny white hand-written letters on her shirt that said "laugh."

I'd never seen anything so beautiful in my life.

"Is that an order, or a noun?" I whispered once Mr. Wallace looked away, busying himself with that attendance roster.

A slim eyebrow arched over one bright green eye. "You don't remember me, do you?"

"If I'd met you before, I wouldn't have forgotten you."

I rubbed my sweating palms against my jeans. Scrawny as I was, I knew I had no chance with the girl. But at least I could charm her with my biting wit.

"I looked a little different back then," she said, leaning in so close I could almost taste the scent vanilla on her skin. She pulled away just as Wallace began to read off the attendance.

After my name was called, she leaned in close again and said, "Jeremy Glass, say hello to yo Pirate Queen."

I had no idea what she was talking about, but I did learn her name was Susannah Durban. The syllables sat on my tongue like melting sugar.

Now

There's some kind of fog in the room. Through the fog I see my father's eyes.

"Jeremy," he says. "Can you hear me?"

The fog is heavy. It bears down on me, forcing my eyes to close.

"Jeremy. Stay with me." Air hisses in my ears. I'm losing the sound, too.

It seems like a long time later when my eyes flutter open again. My gaze lands on my father, struggle to understand why I am lying on my back trying to focus my vision on my dad's bloodsh blue eyes.

"Jeremy," he says. "There was an accident last night."

My mind scrambles to piece together the last thing I remember. Susannah and Ryan fightin Oncoming lights. I struggle to sit, but everything, every inch of me screams with pain.

"Did something happen to Susannah?" I think I am shouting, but instead it comes out as a muffle croak. I sink back on the pillow and let my eyes slip closed.

"Nothing happened to Susannah, as far as I know," Dad says.

I sigh, my eyes still closed, the harsh light stabbing through my eyelids. My heart is starting race and I remember the flask. And how buzzed I was as I stepped onto the road. My memory stop there. Had I ever made it across? "Was her car still there?"

The chair scrapes the linoleum as he slides it closer to me. "I have no idea. Susannah Durban isr really my main concern right now, Jeremy."

My eyes blink open and scan the fluorescent tableau. Machines purr, hum, and bleep. Wires are tubes sprout from me like I'm some kind of space-age hookah pipe.

It's me. I'm the one in a hospital bed. Not Susannah. I'm numb, floating, but I can feel my weig sinking into the hard bed. One foot pushes up from under the blanket and I wiggle my toes to make use it works. The other leg, mottled and swollen as a raw sausage, is suspended above the been enclosed in a configuration of rings and pins. It tingles vaguely, but doesn't actually hurt.

"She was there. With Ryan," I say.

Dad stares at me, his eyes weary and filled with something vague. It dawns on me that it resignation. It's the same expression he dons before a particularly tough trial, along with one of he expensive but slightly worn suits. His calm demeanor makes me want to vault from the bed, run in the hall, and keep going.

No way that's happening.

Dad sighs. "Actually, Susannah's mother, Trudy, called this morning to tell me Susannah nevedid come home last night, as if I could do anything about it."

Was she on the run again? Susannah had run away seven times since Freshman year Dad had hat to intervene on Mrs. Durban's behalf to stop child services from placing her in foster care.

"I told her that, at the moment, I had more pressing things to attend to," he adds.

"Shit." I glance at my engineering feat of a leg and realize that I won't be running anywhere for while.

Dad pushes away the salt and pepper flop of hair from his forehead. His face is creased and the skin under his eyes puffy beneath his lawyer's composure. "Don't worry about Susannah. Worry about yourself."

He looks away. I can tell by the way he swallows he has more to say, but I'm too tired to ask, want to know if they found the water bottle full of vodka, then I realize a simple blood test will to them the whole story. But mostly I want to know where, exactly, Susannah is. I reach for my phon No texts from her.

I don't even think about Ryan, until he walks into the room.

Dad has ducked out for coffee. It's me, Ryan, and the beeping of the machines.

Ryan pulls up the chair Dad has just vacated. "I came as soon as I heard."

I furrow my brow and search my memories. "Dude. Weren't you there?"

Ryan twitches the sandy curls out of his eyes. He studies me, confusion and sorrow mingling of his face. "I was so busy having it out with Susannah we didn't even hear you. Then she started to ru so I chased her."

I stare back at his uber-sincere expression. This from a guy who was pissed I hadn't lied we enough for him. I grind my teeth. "She ran? I thought I saw her fall. It's all rocks, and then there that steep slope to the reservoir."

Ryan shrugs. "She tripped, got up and started running like a mad cow."

"She tripped, or you pushed her?" I try to sit forward, but pain lances through my leg as if a tea of chainsaw-brandishing dwarves have crash-landed on it. I fall back shakily onto the pillows.

"Take it easy, Jer."

I search my mind for details, but the night is hazy, a mix tape of rain, vodka, and bright lights. At then Susannah's face is in front of me—glistening lips, autumn leaf eyes, tears sparkling on the rims. The urge overtakes me, like it always does when there are things I can't face—the urge to ru But I'm pinned to the bed like a butterfly specimen. "Where is she now, Ryan? My dad says she nev got home last night."

"Jeez, Jeremy, how should I know? I did follow her. It's pretty rough going on those rocks. hasn't changed since we used to fish there. And the weather last night was hideous. The ground w slippery. I lost my footing and wrenched my ankle. I couldn't keep up. I just lost her."

"So, she vanished into thin air. And a high school track star like you couldn't keep up with he You expect me to believe that?"

"C'mon, Jeremy, what's up with you? It wasn't like I didn't try to follow her. She was hysteric and I was worried because she cut her head when she fell. But I could barely walk with my ankle, yo know, and I lost track of her. I figured she probably doubled back to where her car was and took off, got back to the road just as they were loading you into the ambulance. You can check the police report They asked me if I'd seen what happened, but I didn't find out it was you in there until later."

"You left a bleeding girl stumbling around in the woods and you didn't wonder why her car we still there," I say in a monotone. "And your ankle looks okay today," I add.

The nurse comes in, adjusts my drip bag, then leaves. Ryan leans forward, his voice so Reasonable. "She wasn't that hurt. Just a scratch. Shit, Jeremy. You know Susannah. She pulls the stunts all the time. She used to run away all the time."

"Right. I saw you hit her, Ryan."

Ryan turns a bit green. "C'mon, Jer. It was just a little shove. If you saw us, then you know slamming me with her fists first. I wasn't going to do anything with Claudia Herman. Suze is ju—oversensitive. You know how she gets."

I'm getting fuzzy. It must be the drugs they keep pumping into me. The words kick out like a kne to the groin. I'm shouting now, my voice hoarse, my mouth flooded with a sour taste.

"You mean how she gets when you fuck around behind her back?"

I want to suck the words back in. In all our years as The Lone Ranger and Tonto, I've nev violated the sidekick rules. Even when I had to bite my tongue so hard it bled.

Outside my room, I hear voices speak rapidly in urgent tones, too low to understand but low enough to recognize. It's Patrick Morgan, Esquire, talking to Dad. I'd know his booming voi anywhere. Ryan's uber-influential father is probably here to make sure the Morgan interests a safeguarded—as in, Ryan's name is kept clean. He had to have heard my outburst and now Dad most likely supplicating himself and pleading to the Almighty for forgiveness on my behalf.

Clouds of cotton breeze over me, my eyes closing. The drugs are claiming me again. I almost forget Ryan is still here, beside me.

"That's not what we fought about, Jer," he says softly.

Behind my closed lids, I still see only Susannah's face. "Then where the hell is she, Ryan?"

thre

Then

"Pirate Queen?" I repeated, at a loss for words. My brain, which was used to snapping facts in place like Lego bricks, groped helplessly for something to latch onto.

"In the playground. With the bossy kid. I gave you a Buffalo nickel. I bet you still have it."

I scratched my head and blurted, "Wait. How long ago was this?", just before Mr. Wallace turne around to glare menacingly at us.

Then it all comes back to me. We were eight, Ryan and I. Ryan's babysitter and my mother were sitting on the playground bench, yakking with the other babysitters and parents. Ryan and I were decinto an epic Pirate Quest. Ryan was Captain Hook. I was the first mate. Of course. We had a six-be team of trusty crewmen at our command. We'd just landed on the deserted island, and according to the map (the one I'd scribbled in crayon on a napkin in the lunchroom earlier that day), we were gettingless.

The last thing we needed was a girl intrusion. Girls were gross. Yucky. Annoying. A patheticall skinny girl with dark skin, a mop of lighter curls, and eyes like lime-green lollipops swung silent from the monkey bars, watching our every move. We ignored her. Until she jumped down and stalke over to us, all knees and elbows, topped with a ridiculous orange bow that was almost as big as h head.

"I'm the Pirate Queen, and I bet I know where the treasure is."

Ryan leaned on his long pirate's staff, a big stick we'd found in the woods that lined the playground. My gaze shifted between the girl and Ryan as he sized her up. He squinted. I squinted too.

"No, you don't," he said. "Girls don't know anything."

"Oh, yeah? If you let me on your treasure hunt, I'll tell you where it is. Take it or leave it."

Ryan swung the sweaty curls from his eyes and squinted harder, his lip curled into an exaggerate sneer. "First, you have to pay us a pirate bounty," he said. Even then, he was great at playing a role.

But the girl was, too.

She shrugged and pulled a four-leaf clover and a Buffalo nickel from her pocket.

Ryan pocketed the clover and tossed the nickel to me.

She seemed to be on her own at the playground. After an hour of intense play, a car pulled up ar honked. The Pirate Queen bounced off with a quick goodbye.

"I would marry that girl," I said to Ryan, watching her go, the Buffalo nickel in my pocket.

"You're a dork," Ryan said. "Girls are stupid."

We never saw her at the playground again.

And there she was. The Pirate Queen. And her name was Susannah.

Susannah Durban.

After class, in the hall, Susannah pulled me aside. "So, do you?"

"Do I what?"

"Still have the nickel."

In my mind, I scanned my cluttered shelves full of mementos. I never threw anything or especially something potentially valuable. I knew just where it was, but I hesitated. I didn't want h to peg me for the geek I was. "Um, probably."

"I'd like it back."

Proximity to this girl was pumping icy fire through my veins. I was helpless under her command If she'd told me to walk down the hall like a chicken, I'd have probably done that, too. But summoned my cool and kept my head together. It was a skill I'd be perfecting over the years. "Sur Okay. I'll look."

"Will you walk me to my next class, Jeremy? I have no idea where West Hall 3 is."

I cleared my throat, honored, yet disturbed that in my feverish state I hadn't offered to be h knight in shining armor first. "Sure," I bumbled. "That's the Bio Lab. I have that fourth period."

She glanced at me and smiled a darkly shy cat smile, as if she knew she'd just taken permane possession of my soul.

On the walk to West Hall 3, I tried to make casual conversation and wondered if she could dete the tremor in my voice. I'd had crushes before, fleeting little fancies that blew in and out with the breeze, all, of course, unreciprocated. But this was different. This was not a breeze. This was hurricane gale. "So, uh, what brought you back to Riverton after all these years? The thriving cultur scene?"

Riverton has exactly three restaurants, a nature preserve, an ice cream shop called Awesome Cova a library, a supermarket, and the Riverton Historical Society. The Society was founded through the largesse of the Morgan dynasty, primarily to document and showcase their near century-long stranglehold on the town and to preside over the properties they'd donated to the state. In it you can see old photos of the whole Morgan brood, from their original dry goods store to the three mansic overlooking the river, one now a historic site. There's a young and handsome Patrick Morgan on handling day when he married Ryan's mother, Celia. If you squint, you can even see my parent holding hands in the background. You can see pictures of Patrick, with numerous athletic trophies. There's a graduation photo on a framed yearbook page, Patrick and his friends in caps and gown.

"Ha! My mom's a realtor. She was showing a house in Riverton that day when I told you I was the Pirate Queen. Last month, she found out that the house she grew up in was on the market. So signabled it, and back to Riverton we are."

I struggled to focus and connect this exotic creature to the little waif from the playground. The pointy ankles and skinny ribs were all smoothed over in streamlined curves. I was actually short breath, as if I'd just sprinted a mile. "Your mother grew up here? So did my parents. Maybe they a knew each other."

"Maybe," she said, her gaze suddenly distant, then added, "Hey. Where is that bossy kid with the big stick? Does he still live in Riverton?"

"His name is Ryan. Ryan Morgan. If your mother is from here, then she has to know the Morgan. They basically own this town."

Now

Time in the hospital is formless. Shapeless. People come and go, but coherent thoughts are hard come by. I drift slowly up from my dreams to find Dad by my bedside, his eyes even more sh through with red veins than before. I have a fleeting thought of how quiet the house must be with hi rattling around alone without me to hassle.

"Jeremy," he says. "They've operated."

beaming megawatt smiles in black and white.

The words shock me off my cloud of cotton fuzz. "On me?" Dad gives me his sorrowful on cornered smile, as if there's a tax on using both sides of his mouth. Or maybe they don't work tandem. I realize I can't even remember what his two-cornered smile looks like, or if he'd ever hone.

"On your leg, Jeremy. The break was very serious. Your tibia was fractured in three places. The doctors say you have compartment syndrome, which is when—"

It's a known fact that Dad reverts to jargon during times of stress. Usually it's legal jargon, be medical terminology is more suited to the occasion. I cut him off with my own trademarked brand issue avoidance. "Did you know that there are historic records of bones being set all the way back 3000 BC?"

"Jeremy." He sighs. "This is serious. You're going to be off your feet for a while. And—and the won't know if the surgery took for about a month."

The last words sting like the peeled skin of a blister. "Took? What does that mean? My leg wasr cut off and reattached, was it?"

Dad's face is blotchy and purplish. The breath whistles out through his nose. "No. It's all there He stands abruptly. "I'm going to send the surgeon in to speak to you. Maybe she can explain thing better than I can."

"Dad, just a second. Was Ryan there when they loaded me into the ambulance? He says he wa And his car should have been there. He says it's on the police report. Did you see the report?"

He stares at me for a beat as if I'm speaking a different language. "Does that really matter rig now, Jeremy? Look at you."

"It matters to me."

Dad heaves a sigh. "I saw the police report, Jeremy. The truck driver that hit you called the accident in and waited with you until the ambulance came. There won't be any charges filed. The was no one else there. Ryan went for dinner with his parents after the show."

"But, Ryan was there with Susannah! I saw his car. I saw him. He says the police talked to hi after the accident. Asked him if he'd seen it. Why would he lie?"

My father's face grows red. "Jeremy. Please. You were in a terrible accident. What you think you remember may not have been what actually happened. I'm an attorney, so I know—people have been convicted on the false memories of witnesses. Be careful about what you claim you saw, because you recollections may be faulty."

"I know what I saw. Ryan was there. We just talked about it. Ask him."

"Patrick Morgan made sure I got a copy of the report, and there's absolutely no mention of Ryabeing a witness at the accident scene." Dad wipes his brow and continues in a low and soothing tor "This will all blow over when Susannah turns up. So settle down. You have other, more important things to think about right now. Like your health. The doctor will be along in a minute."

Dad scoots out of the room, leaving my confused mind to make sense of the conflicting account Why would Ryan say he was there if he wasn't?

Instead of the doctor, a very small person, her tiny face lost in a fury of dark hair, shuffles hesitantly, like Dorothy approaching the Wizard. She's wearing a white uniform and holding package.

"They said it was okay to come in. Is this a bad time?"

I glance at my leg. It's swathed in white gauze and suspended by an elaborate system of wires an pulleys the Brooklyn Bridge would envy. "Are you a nurse?"

She shakes her head. "I'm Marisa. I work for Mrs. Durban."

Mrs. Durban. Susannah's mother. I'd met her maybe three times, but we'd barely spoke Something about her fierce eyes and harsh features put me off. I can't imagine working for her, ar feel pity for this slight girl.

I detect a faint accent. Her eyes are large and luminous. She looks about eleven. She looks lisshe's about to pee her pants.

I check out her boobs. Definitely not eleven.

I know this girl. She goes to my school. But she's nearly invisible there, someone who slips fro shadow to shadow, barely stirring the air as she moves.

She hands me the package, messily wrapped in brown paper and covered in marker scribblings turn it over in my hands and spot my name in the jumble.

Marisa is skittish, like a cat at the edge of a riverbank. "Mrs. Durban found this in Susannah room. She asked me to bring it to you."

"So no one's heard anything from Susannah yet?" I ask, still turning the package over and over My fingers tremble. I've lost track of time in the hospital. How many days have I been in here? Two Four? A week?

"No. Not that I know of." Marisa says, and turns to leave.

"Do you want me to open it now?" I ask, though I regret it instantly. The package is meant for m Susannah wrote my name on it. Me.

I glance at my phone on the bed table. My calls to Susannah have gone to voicemail, text messag unanswered. Where is she? Is anyone looking for her? Suddenly, I'm afraid to open the package.

"I have to go now," Marisa says. And she does.

I'm alone with my trussed-up leg and a package from Susannah.

The phone shuddering beside me nearly jolts me off the bed. It's a text. A YouTube link from Susannah.

I click the link and it directs me to another one of her animations. Leaves float through black spa in the herky-jerky, stop-action way that is Susannah's style.

She wanted to study animation, I think. She'd just come back from visiting her way older hall brother, Dennis, in Rhode Island. One of her mother's cast-offs, Susannah called him. She'd ofte wondered how many more there were. Going to RISD meant everything to her. Why on earth wou she run away now, when she was almost free? Where would she go?

I think of her face as she told me she skipped out on the college tour, and watch the small screed cluttered with Susannah's personal iconography. Old gravestones. Torn lace. Faded cigar boxes.

Before she'd left, I'd barraged her with interesting tidbits about Rhode Island and she'd scribble them in the ratty little notebook she took wherever she went. The first circus pitched its tent Newport in 1774. The world's oldest operating carousel is in Watch Hill. Hence, the pen from Watch Hill.

And, sure enough, a carousel horse flies past an eerie circus tent.

I shudder.

This is recent.

And I wonder—has Susannah been keeping secrets of her own from me? From everyone?

The scene closes in on a mound of dirt. A pair of disembodied hands unearth a peeling cigar bo The box opens. Inside is a word in old wood-type lettering. And I have my answer.

SECRETS

Shaking, I rest my phone upside-down on the bedside table.

My eyes close, and all I can see is her face, watching me, asking me silently what I'm going to deforcing me to relive the many ways I've failed her.

I lie there, the package sitting on my lap. An hour. Two hours. Time here is, again, shapeles measured by the beeps of the equipment I'm connected to. I step onto the cloud that has lowered itse like a magic carpet.

Then

As if she'd conjured him just by the mention of his name, Ryan ambled down the hall, heade straight for us, his eyes locked on Susannah. I guess I might have wished somewhere deep inside n animal brain that Susannah would have been as mesmerized with me as I was with her, but that tin hope was quickly snuffed out when I saw the look in her eyes.

I knew that look. It was the glazed expression most girls got when they laid eyes on Ryan Morgan Susannah's lips had fallen open, as if she'd been struck dumb by a holy vision, and I wondere where that tough little Pirate Queen had gone. Gritting my teeth, I imagined Ryan as he looked at he the saintly corona glowing around his head full of wavy gold hair.

I wanted to pull her aside and warn her that, though I loved him like a brother, angelic Ryan was already, even in ninth grade, hell on girls. In eighth grade he'd torn through about five relationship leaving a trail of flaming wreckage behind him, broken-hearted nymphettes who followed me around hungry for any little crumbs of information about him I could provide.

But I did no such thing. Despite his flaws, my loyalty was to Ryan. Steadfast and true, I squeeze my sweaty hands into my pockets, clenched them into fists, and clamped my mouth firmly shut.

Now

The weight of the package on my lap pulls me back. So does the persistent throb in my leg. Whe are the nurses when you need them?

I tear open the package.

Inside is another package wrapped like a gift. On it is a label. The word SECRETS is stamped across it.

I tear it open, terrified, yet desperate to know what's inside. Terrified to learn what burden sl wants to place on me. Terrified that I owe her and that I'm partly to blame for her pain.

It's a wine-colored velvet pouch with a flap. Inside are five candles, a pendant on a red cord, piece of chalk, and a parchment envelope. The pendant is the Kabbalah one Susannah always wear The one Ryan gave her. I strain to recall if she was wearing it the night she disappeared, but there is a way to know for sure; she'd been wearing a jacket. My hands sweaty, leg grinding with pain, I pull the paper from its envelope.

There's a Post-it note stuck to it, written in Susannah's neat hand.

I'm entrusting my secrets to you, Jeremy.

The pain chews its way up my leg. I read the title of the paper under the Post-it.

To Summon The Dead

Where the hell are those nurses?

The pain shoots pointy roots up my spine and into my cranium. I reach for the call button and stuthe package under my pillow, squeezing my eyes against the tears.

In the time it takes to blink, the pain brings a flash of crystal clarity. And I know.

I may never run again.

History is only a crutch that won't support me any longer.

But history, because of my love of it and of her, is why Susannah is entrusting her secrets to me.

fοι

Then

The look of rapture on Susannah's face was reflected in Ryan's. It was a look of curiosity ar wonder, a look of such intensity that I knew anything I did to come between them was pointless. Rig there in the hall near West Hall 3, I witnessed two people falling in love.

It felt like horses were trampling over my chest, like my ribs were cracking, the bone shar jammed into the soft tissue of my lungs.

But I kept the smile pasted on my face and managed to speak between painful breaths. It was skill I'd come to master over the next three years. "Susannah. This is Ryan Morgan. The bossy k from the playground. Ryan, meet the Pirate Queen."

Ryan's blue eyes dilated, his mouth falling open like he was about to take a bite of the mo luscious ice cream cone ever. "Huh?" he said, eloquent as usual.

"From the park. It was like five, six years ago? Remember when we used to play pirates, and the girl came along and you said that girls were—"

"Yeah! I remember. I said girls were stupid."

I didn't mention that I was the one who'd vowed I was going to marry her.

Susannah smiled and flipped some stray curls out of her face. "You really said that?"

Ryan chuckled. "What did I know when I was eight? Where's your class? I'll take you there."

And just like that, he slipped a muscled arm over her slim shoulder and they drifted away as it wasn't there. As if they'd been standing alone. I watched them go, the ridiculous smile clamped on n face like a too-tight mask.

Now (November 26th)

Six days later, I'm carted out of the hospital, a pincushion on wheels.

I've had no further contact from Susannah and there's been no sign of her. Search teams have combed the reservoir banks and turned up nothing. Trudy Durban has been on the news nightly pleading for information about her whereabouts, leaving me to ponder why she's never called to as me what was in the package.

Dad rolls my chair out to the car, my casted leg pointing the way like a battle standard.

My leg, the doctor tells me, is on probation. Okay, that's not how she put it. Compartme syndrome. Nerve endings starved for oxygen. Potential tissue death. I heard every other word, but got the point.

Wrapped in gauze and held together by pins and rods, my leg has a month to plead its case.

I'm sent home with a set of crutches, metal ones, with cushions to support my armpits as protruding rubber grips that comfortably fit my grasp. There's a sturdy permanence about the unlike the one-size-fits-all wood crutches you can buy in the local drugstore.

I don't trust them.

Dad's had a narrow makeshift wood ramp built over half the steps so I can roll in through the badoor. His study-slash-den on the first floor is to be my home while I recuperate. I maneuver the wheelchair to the window and watch the sparrows land at the feeder Dad and I set up on the ancie gnarled oak at the end of our driveway last winter. I want to fly away too, but instead I'll be collecting dust like the artifacts on my shelves.

Days pass. I don't want to think about what's going on with the crushed bone beneath the raw sk of my injured leg. I can't feel my toes, but even after three painkillers my shin still announces it throbbing presence. A forbidden sip from the Civil War canteen from last year's re-enactment cleverly hidden behind the towers of DVDs in the wall unit, can't stop it, either.

I rise on the crutches and stumble around the room, back and forth, back and forth, dragging n Eiffel Tower of a leg. It's good resistance training, I tell myself. By the time I get the cast off, n other leg should be made of iron.

Then I bench press. Ten times. Twenty times. Fifty. Until my arms burn and my neck sinew about to snap.

I fall into the chair, soaked with sweat, and watch the birds some more.

It doesn't work. The pain is still there.

I flick on the TV and turn to the local news. The media feeding frenzy over Susannah disappearance has reached a fever pitch. Trudy Durban's pleas have hit a chord. She is convincing, grief-stricken mother, begging for word of her daughter. Even the town which had rejected her that to her pleas. But there's no sign of her. Thirteen days and counting since Susannah disappeared. Since my leg began its battle for survival.

Kabbalah. Susannah's latest in a continuum of shifting passions. Before her trip, I'd found an o book on it. I'd made a passing effort to bone up on it so I could appear interested, but it's not enoug to help me now.

Are the clues to her disappearance somehow linked to her interest in ancient Hebrew mysticism Lately, Susannah's art had taken on a distinctly spiritual quality. She'd started an amazing drawing, brightly colored diagram of numbers, circles, and Hebrew letters superimposed over a gnarled tr drawn with gray ink on black paper. She'd smiled cryptically and told me it was the Tree of Lif She'd never shown me the finished art.

I think about what little I learned of Kabbalah, or know about the Jewish religion in general. Do never pushed for much except for a menorah at Chanukah and Passover dinners at my aunt's in New Jersey. Mom wasn't much of a Christian, either, except at Christmas, when her exquisitely tradition ornaments emerged from attic boxes. Every December they'd hung from a live spruce Dad and chopped down from the woods behind our house. It has been a long time since we've had one of thos

I close that door fast. Memories of my mother are not safe terrain.

Religion was never a big factor in my upbringing. As far as I knew, it was even less so Susannah's; according to her, her mother was raised Jewish, but converted to Catholicism. Susanna claimed she was everything and nothing.

But while I immersed myself in history, running, and other less acceptable pursuits, Susannah w searching for something more.

What was she looking for? Had she found it?

I review what I've learned and find nothing to help me. The writings of the Kabbalah are high spiritual teachings intended to explain the workings of the universe, the connection of the earth plane to the divine, and the human soul's relationship to all of it. Very positive stuff. Nothing diabolical or domenic in there that I could find diabolical or demonic in there that I could find.

Yet I remember Susannah was particularly interested in the explanation of what happened to the soul after it passed to the next plane.

I shiver and think of the velvet pouch, buried at the bottom of my gym bag. What other, dark roads had Susannah's quest led her down?

During my hospital stay, someone from Durban Realtors kept calling my cell and hanging upprobably Mrs. Durban or Marisa, wanting to know what was in the package Susannah left me. wonder if Marisa ever told Trudy Durban about the package in the first place. I imagine she wou have torn it open, even if it was addressed to me.

I shudder. I can't face Mrs. Durban. Then I'd have to admit I was there that night. That I failed help Susannah because I'm a drunk.

Time is rapidly taking on a new shape. Instead of the smooth lake of history, a place I can was into and do the backstroke, it's a whirling funnel that tapers to a single point, impaling me on the memory of the night Susannah disappeared.

Suddenly, I can't get away from the surge of memories that press against my skull, threatening crack it wide open. I fight the useless urge to run. Birds with clipped wings can't fly.

Then

Ryan didn't call, text, or show up on Facebook that night. But I did see he'd added a new Facebook friend to his impressive stable. I stalked Susannah's privacy protected profile, learning nothing an not daring to add her. At midnight, the friend request from her came in, and without hesitation, accepted and jumped to her page. Photos of her. Photos of her art. Crazy art. Wild art. Towering constructions of junk teetering in unknown backyards, a much skinnier, younger Susannah smiling beside them. And then a chat window opened.

Hey, thanks for adding me. Sorry about what happened today. I get easily distracted.

I was seething, aching, worse than the aftermath of any marathon run. But I knew from the stathat girls like Susannah didn't go for dorks like me. It wasn't the natural order of things. And there shows, offering an olive branch. Maybe even offering a chance at friendship.

And so, for fear of getting blocked from her circle, I became a satellite, a planet caught in h orbit. Agreeable Jeremy Glass, who didn't care if his heart was passed through a meat grinder, as lor as he got to breathe the same air.

No problem. I typed, each idiotic keystroke like a nail hammered into a coffin of my own makin See you in class tomorrow.

Now

My phone trembles on the unmade bed. A text. Probably Ryan again. He's been checking in ever day, sometimes twice, along with a few other kids from the track team. After pressure from Dad, I long since apologized for my outburst, claiming it was the drugs that loosened my tongue. Under the circumstances, Ryan forgave me. Now he and the guys want to visit, but I'm just not in the mood see anyone.

I propel my wheelchair to the bed, rolling over and around the clothes and other crap scatter across the floor. Though Dad has tried to straighten up, the mess has grown to epic proportions at leaning down from the wheelchair to pick up my clothes makes my leg explode with pain.

I freeze, staring at my phone until my eyes burn.

The text is from Susannah.

Maybe, I tell myself, she's finally getting in touch. Maybe this entire episode really is an elabora prank of hers, some ill-conceived attempt at the performance art she'd admired after a class trip visit trendy galleries in Chelsea. Eventually, everything Susannah saw, learned, or thought abo filtered into her art.

She wouldn't go back to her brother in Rhode Island. Maybe she's got other half siblings, estranged uncles. Maybe she's located her mysterious father. By now, she's realized the whopper of mistake she made by running off. Maybe this whole thing is about punishing Trudy Durban, paybac for being a lousy mother. It's a well-known fact that Trudy is a bitch with a dangerous temper and violent streak. In one notorious incident, Trudy shot a neighbor's dog that had wandered into her yar claiming the dog was possessed. Susannah claimed that one time Trudy had even threatened her.

Improbably, I picture Susannah by the ocean in a white dress, her bronze curls lifted in the sal breeze.

The vision crumbles. Instead, I see her closed eyelids, paper-thin and bluish, dried leaves and bit of dirt caught in the snarled strands spread around her like seaweed.

My temples throb. I open my eyes and read the text. I'm breathing hard. No actual response to n repeated texts. No confirmation that she's read them. Nothing but another private link to a stop-action animation.

Ryan does a herky-jerky hula across a colorized photo of a backyard. It's my backyard. He stops my tire swing and strikes an Egyptian-like pose by the gnarled oak tree at the end of our driveway, ar pulls off his smiling face like a mask to reveal a frowning face beneath. A flowering bush sprouts. sign is pitched into the ground.

SECRETS—DIG HERE

Shaking, I sit in the chair and watch the sun sink between the naked trees. I doze and wake up, n neck cramped, back stiff. It's late now. Dad has left me dinner on a tray and probably gone to be We've spoken so little since I got home. What is there to say that won't dredge up the stuff we can talk about?

I lie back on the reclining leather lounger in front of the flat screen and flick on an old movie fro Netflix. Some study. I'm pretty sure this is where Dad kicks back and watches porn, though sadly can't find any evidence of that. Instead, I watch some stupid eighties movie about girls and nero which hits a bit too close to home.

I don't realize I've fallen asleep again until I wake gasping, heart thudding against my ribs. Ne lungs are filling with water. I claw at my throat, unable to breathe. Unable to scream, until I final choke out a cry for help.

It's starting again.

With my usual defenses stripped away, I'm powerless to stop it. Now there's nothing to hold bacthe return of the terrors.

Then

I was nine when Mom picked me up from camp that afternoon, the summer after encountering the Pirate Queen. It was just an ordinary day and Mom was there, like always, but that day something sharp scraped inside my stomach, ordering me not to get in the car. On occasion, Dad left the office of a bit and drove me home for Mom. For some reason I couldn't explain, I distinctly remember wishing this were one of those days.

Even though the loop of that day has replayed so many times in my head, I can't rememb anything particularly unusual about Mom as she strolled over to my cluster of unruly campers. So was neatly groomed as always, prettier than most of the other moms, that army of frowzy, chubby, are harried women who emerged from their refrigerated SUVs, clutching their containers of iced coffe to claim their young.

Mom's blond hair was pulled into a crisp ponytail, her refined features free and clear of makeu She patted my head and kissed me on the cheek. I caught a whiff of her French perfume and a spla of cinnamon mouthwash, but as she pulled away I saw that feral wildness in her eyes, the emp hopelessness I'd sometimes glimpse when she thought I wasn't looking; the glazed look of a wound deer as it lies dying on the forest floor.

Her hands gripped the steering wheel so tightly the knuckles were white. She glanced at me in the rear-view mirror and smiled, but her eyes were puffy and red.

If I'd refused to get in the car with her, maybe it never would have happened.

Mom might still be alive.

Now

I hear myself screaming.

Hair unkempt, Dad comes skidding into the study in his bathrobe. I fight to draw breath into n constricted airways. He settles beside me on the chair's armrest and pulls my sweaty head against heats. "It's okay, Jeremy. It's okay," he murmurs.

I force my breathing to calm and pull away.

"Was it one of those nightmares again? I thought you stopped having those."

My heart speeds up again. I want to run. I want to run.

I want to drink.

"I'm okay, Dad," I finally manage to say. "It happens sometimes, but not as much as—you kno—when it happened. I'm kind of used to it, I guess."

He stands, pats my head, and then steps back and stares at me for a beat before he speaks. "The doctor tells me that these things are normal after a trauma. And you've just been through another.. He stops, the words that almost slipped out trapped safely behind his teeth. "Get some sleep. You suryou don't want me to help you onto the daybed?"

I meet his gaze, questions sizzling on my tongue. The ones I'll never ask.

Why? Why did she do it?

Dad looks so earnest. So concerned.

Yet no words have ever been spoken between us about what caused my mother to drink ever afternoon—and drive her car off the road into the Riverton Gorge with her nine-year-old son strappe into the backseat.

I feign sleep and listen to his slippered feet retreat to the hall, back to the world beyond this room. And now I can't stand it anymore. Dad's study has become the inside of Mom's car as we sailed over the embankment and plunged into the Gorge, dark waters rising to my eyes, filling my mouth at throat. The pressurized silence as Mom's hair floated free from its binding in slow motion, like the sea anemones I'd seen at the aquarium.

I wait a half hour until the house noises go silent. Until I'm certain Dad has gone back to slee Grabbing the crutches, I throw them over my lap and wheel myself into the kitchen.

Dad's stash is in the pantry. He thinks I don't know that he's never tossed out the contents of Mom's well-stocked bar, the rows of Absolut lined up like my collection of tin soldiers. He's hidden the treasure trove behind a few massive bags of barbecue charcoal. Over the years I've been refilling them with water.

I can't imagine why he keeps them.

A shrine to Mom? A test for me?

I raise myself gingerly onto the crutches, appalled how tough it is to balance, even with n workout regimen. I hobble into the dark pantry, careful not to scrape the crutches or fall. I'm shak the need for the liquor's cold warmth calls out from deep inside my bones, drowning out the shame feel as I reach for what killed my mother and almost killed me eight years ago.

I find the bottle I've marked as having the purest undiluted vodka. I've only turned to the pantry a last resort, so there's plenty to last me.

Uncapping the bottle, I take a swallow, knowing how the liquid will dull my mind, slow no reflexes and make balancing on these crutches an Olympic challenge. But I've run marathons aft downing half a bottle. And won.

Then

The next day at school, Susannah was wearing an identical black T-shirt, this time with whi cargo pants and flip-flops. Her toenails were painted black; though I tried not to stare at her feet couldn't help but notice there were tiny words painted on each nail. Her hair was piled high on h head and it took all my strength not to reach over and pull out the contraption that held it all there, it would tumble around her shoulders in a shimmering waterfall of curls.

Her T-shirt had the same tiny word "laugh", which was now joined by two other words, "at the..."

"Is that a time released T-shirt?" I asked, and was treated to a Mona Lisa smirk.

She pointed her foot and wiggled her toes. "Look."

I leaned in closer and read the message on her toenails. "...world laughs with you. Weep, and you weep alone."

"Is that your motto?"

"Yep," she said, already bent over a box of found material, from which we were all expecte under the reptile gaze of Mr. Wallace, to create a self-portrait that was both breathtakingly origin and meaningful.

"It's mine, too."

I stared miserably out the window, pondering the exact number of crows that perched on the telephone pole, trying not to think that my self-portrait should be a rusting old car at the bottom of the Gorge.

By the time I'd snapped out of my reverie, Susannah had constructed a figure with a protruding r cage and outstretched arms entirely from tiny bits of windshield glass and a coat hanger.

"Is that a portrait of me?" I asked, smiling. "You know, Jeremy Glass?"

Susannah slanted her head, dead serious. "You're a real kidder, aren't you? Where's yours?"

"I'm still thinking." I said, actually wondering why this sunshiny girl was making a portrait herself with broken glass. "I guess I'll do a running shoe. That's what I am. A runner."

She smiled, then said, "Aren't we all?" Returning to her efforts, so deeply engrossed in her wo that she didn't even notice when the bell rang.

When I think of Susannah, this is how I like to see her—deep in concentration, her brow furrowe I wonder if art for her is like running is for me, an escape from the dark things that always threaten black out the sun.

Now

The sharp edge of my panic dulls. I'm ready to face Susannah's treasure hunt now.

I hobble unsteadily to the back door and peer out. A black void looms beyond the three steps from the stoop to the driveway and the oak tree beyond. Navigating the steps with crutches is a skill I've y to master. Doing so with a half-bottle of vodka sloshing through my veins is a whole other level challenge.

But I have to know if there really is a message in the animation, or if Susannah is just playing wi me. Why would she send me animations and not get in touch? Anger flares unexpectedly.

She's abandoned me in my time of need.

Where the hell is she? I have to know.

One precarious step, two steps, three. My sneaker touches asphalt a few seconds before the rubb crutch tips catch up with it. I'm still standing.

I pause, mustering the courage to cross the dark driveway to the old oak tree that was so clearly to one in the animation. I imagine the air rushing by my face as I run, muscles pumping as the pavement purrs beneath my rubber soles. The ground slants. It's the longest few yards I've ever faced. Long than the final leg of the marathon I'd run last summer, gripped by fever and violent stomach cramps.

Across the dark gulf of pavement, I reach the tree. My tree. I wonder if the animation is a map guide me here. But why?

I'm at the base of the tree, moonlight falling on its tangled roots. The night wind nips at my shirt and flaps my pajama pants. Ragged clouds frame the moon's taunting smile. A few raindrop fall. My shattered leg registers nothing, only the steady ache from within the crushed bone, pounding its ominous drumbeat.

The vodka is wearing off and I'm hit by a wave of exhaustion. If I could run, I'd sprint back in the house and crawl under the covers. But coming out here is a commitment. Now I have to follothrough.

I glance up to the second-floor windows. Dad's room is still dark. The wind kicks up. Cold ra slaps the driveway, plastering my hair to my scalp. Gingerly, I lower myself until I am sitting on m butt, the scaffolded leg jutting out like a bridge to nowhere. Rain muddles the place where the grow of moss has been disturbed not so long ago.

Using the tip of my crutch as a spade, I loosen the dirt. The rubber tip bonks something har Swiveling, I dig with both hands and feel the corner of what appears to be a box or something.

Rain slams me with repeated thuds. Muddy water fills the hole I've made as I pull a cigar box of the ground. Though the colorful paper label has nearly disintegrated, I recognize the box as the of from Susannah's animation. I open it. There's nothing inside except a plastic baggie with a photo Ryan sealed within. Someone has defaced it with markers and Wite-Out to give him long eyelashed and a mouthful of Dracula teeth. There's a strip of paper in Susannah's neat printing that reads:

Ryan has secrets, too.

I close the box, let the rain wash away the grime, and tuck it under my arm. My mind revs, b then stalls. It's as oversaturated as my T-shirt, unable to process the fact that the box in Susannah video link actually exists.

Water eddies down the slope, pooling around my butt. Cold liquid streams off the met contraption holding my leg together. I feel nothing but a vague burning itch as I laboriously make n way back inside the house.

five

Now

I wake to quiet. Slivers of light creep across the clothes and papers strewn around my floor. I' sprawled on the daybed, naked save for the strip of sheet draped over my privates like in Renaissance nude. I don't remember peeling off my soaked clothes or where I'd put them. My he vibrates like a rhapsody played on steel drums. My leg thrums, the swelling skin between the pins h to my touch.

Dad has left my daily fix of Vicodin on the mini-fridge with a glass of water, a banana, and a box of dry cereal. There is a carton of milk inside.

I dress and chase down the two pills with gulps of water before the grumble of pain becomes scream. I settle on the bed and wait for the Vikes to kick in and keep the gnawing pain at bay.

Watching my chest rise and fall, I imagine Susannah wiping my brow with a cold compress. Wh I really need right now is a nurse. A very pretty nurse.

My thoughts skim through lazy fields of memory and imagination. Susannah cavorts through the tall grass flinging flowers at me. My stomach rumbles. I'm starved.

But I'd rather drink before the golden memories turn ugly, grow fangs and bite me.

I consider reaching for the few remaining dregs of vodka in the canteen above my head, but n that idea. Too much effort. The Vicodin will have to do.

Hours drift by. If I don't move too much, the numbing haze of my meds masks the grinding gea in my leg well enough that I'm almost comfortable. I reach for the Civil War history book on the nig table. Mandatory reading for some, guilty pleasure for me. My thoughts flow back to a different age I pore over battle trivia and primary documents. At first, I think the rapping at my door is artille fire. The book flies from my hands.

"Dude! It's me!" says a muffled voice through the closed door. "The back door was open. Can come in?"

Ryan. "This isn't a good time," I call out weakly. My leg slowly heats like a sausage on a spit realize it's been hours since I last took a painkiller. There's an aching heaviness between my ribs. Mands are like weights at the ends of my arms.

"You in there, Jer?" Ryan calls through the door.

I try to answer, but before I have the chance, the door bursts open. Ryan peers at me, arms folde "Dude. You look like crap."

"Thanks for clearing that up. I was just sitting around wondering if I really do look as shitty as feel."

"Sorry." Ryan smiles and sets a box on the night table. "The guys and I thought you'd like the complete set of Ken Burns' Civil War documentary. To kill the time while you recuperate, yo know?"

My gaze flits to the boxed set of DVDs on the table. I'm kind of touched they picked somethin I'd really like. Normally my heart would leap at such a treasure. But it can't even muster a flutte "Cool. Tell them thanks."

sample content of Breaking Glass

- click Introduction to C++ Programming and Graphics
- read online Perfect: A Novel here
- Staying Strong: 365 Days a Year pdf, azw (kindle), epub
- download online Last Man in Tower
- Here is New York pdf
- http://hasanetmekci.com/ebooks/Introduction-to-C---Programming-and-Graphics.pdf
- http://tuscalaural.com/library/Winesburg--Ohio--Penguin-Classics-.pdf
- http://fitnessfatale.com/freebooks/Staying-Strong--365-Days-a-Year.pdf
- http://toko-gumilar.com/books/Last-Man-in-Tower.pdf
- http://kamallubana.com/?library/Here-is-New-York.pdf