

Illustrated by H. M. Brock

By Jane Auster

Contents

Front Cover
Chapter 1
Chapter 2
Chapter 3
Chapter 4
Chapter 5
Chapter 6
Chapter 7
Chapter 8
Chapter 9
Chapter 10
Chapter 11
Chapter 12
Chapter 13
Chapter 14
Chapter 15
Chapter 16
Chapter 17
Chapter 18
Chapter 19
Chapter 20
Chapter 21
Chapter 22

Chapter 23
Chapter 24
Chapter 25
Chapter 26
Chapter 27
Chapter 28
Chapter 29
Chapter 30
Chapter 31
Chapter 32
Chapter 33
Chapter 34
Chapter 35
Chapter 36
Chapter 37
Chapter 38
Chapter 39
Chapter 40
Chapter 41
Chapter 42
Chapter 43
Chapter 44
Chapter 45
Chapter 46
Chapter 47

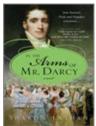

Mansfield Park

By Jane Austen (1814)

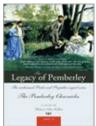

Get updates on everything Jane Austen and learn about great Jane Austen sequels.

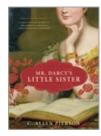

www.sourcebooks.com/austen

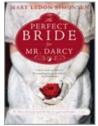

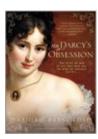

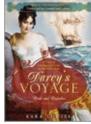

Chapter 1

About thirty years ago Miss Maria Ward, of Huntingdon, with only seven thousand pounds, had the good luck to captivate Sir Thomas Bertram, of Mansfield Park, in the county of Northampton, and be thereby raised to the rank of a baronet's lady, with all the comforts and consequences of a handsome house and large income. All Huntingdon exclaimed on the greatness of the match, and h uncle, the lawyer, himself, allowed her to be at least three thousand pounds short of any equitab claim to it. She had two sisters to be benefited by her elevation; and such of their acquaintance thought Miss Ward and Miss Frances quite as handsome as Miss Maria, did not scruple to predi their marrying with almost equal advantage. But there certainly are not so many men of large fortuing in the world as there are pretty women to deserve them. Miss Ward, at the end of half a dozen year found herself obliged to be attached to the Rev. Mr. Norris, a friend of her brotherin-law, with scarcely any private fortune, and Miss Frances fared yet worse. Miss Ward's match, indeed, when came to the point, was not contemptible: Sir Thomas being happily able to give his friend an incompany to the point, was not contemptible. in the living of Mansfield; and Mr. and Mrs. Norris began their career of conjugal felicity with ve little less than a thousand a year. But Miss Frances married, in the common phrase, to disoblige h family, and by fixing on a lieutenant of marines, without education, fortune, or connexions, did it ve thoroughly. She could hardly have made a more untoward choice. Sir Thomas Bertram had interest which, from principle as well as pride–from a general wish of doing right, and a desire of seeing a that were connected with him in situations of respectability, he would have been glad to exert for the advantage of Lady Bertram's sister; but her husband's profession was such as no interest could reac and before he had time to devise any other method of assisting them, an absolute breach between the sisters had taken place. It was the natural result of the conduct of each party, and such as a ve imprudent marriage almost always produces. To save herself from useless remonstrance, Mrs. Price never wrote to her family on the subject till actually married. Lady Bertram, who was a woman very tranquil feelings, and a temper remarkably easy and indolent, would have contented herself wi merely giving up her sister, and thinking no more of the matter; but Mrs. Norris had a spirit activity, which could not be satisfied till she had written a long and angry letter to Fanny, to point of the folly of her conduct, and threaten her with all its possible ill consequences. Mrs. Price, in her tur was injured and angry; and an answer, which comprehended each sister in its bitterness, and bestow such very disrespectful reflections on the pride of Sir Thomas as Mrs. Norris could not possibly ke to herself, put an end to all intercourse between them for a considerable period.

Their homes were so distant, and the circles in which they moved so distinct, as almost to preclude the means of ever hearing of each other's existence during the eleven following years, or, at least, make it very wonderful to Sir Thomas that Mrs. Norris should ever have it in her power to tell their as she now and then did, in an angry voice, that Fanny had got another child. By the end of elevent years, however, Mrs. Price could no longer afford to cherish pride or resentment, or to lose or connexion that might possibly assist her. A large and still increasing family, an husband disabled for active service, but not the less equal to company and good liquor, and a very small income to supp their wants, made her eager to regain the friends she had so carelessly sacrificed; and she addressed Lady Bertram in a letter which spoke so much contrition and despondence, such a superfluity children, and such a want of almost everything else, as could not but dispose them all to reconciliation. She was preparing for her ninth lying-in; and after bewailing the circumstance, as imploring their countenance as sponsors to the expected child, she could not conceal how importance she felt they might be to the future maintenance of the eight already in being. Her eldest was a boy ten years old, a fine spirited fellow, who longed to be out in the world; but what could she do? Wathere any chance of his being hereafter useful to Sir Thomas in the concerns of his West India property? No situation would be beneath him; or what did Sir Thomas think of Woolwich? or ho could a boy be sent out to the East?

The letter was not unproductive. It re-established peace and kindness. Sir Thomas sent friend advice and professions, Lady Bertram dispatched money and baby-linen, and Mrs. Norris wrote the letters.

Such were its immediate effects, and within a twelvemonth a more important advantage to Mr Price resulted from it. Mrs. Norris was often observing to the others that she could not get her posister and her family out of her head, and that, much as they had all done for her, she seemed to have wanting to do more; and at length she could not but own it to be her wish that poor Mrs. Price should be relieved from the charge and expense of one child entirely out of her great number. "What if the were among them to undertake the care of her eldest daughter, a girl now nine years old, of an age require more attention than her poor mother could possibly give? The trouble and expense of it them would be nothing, compared with the benevolence of the action." Lady Bertram agreed with histantly. "I think we cannot do better," said she; "let us send for the child."

Sir Thomas could not give so instantaneous and unqualified a consent. He debated and hesitated; was a serious charge;—a girl so brought up must be adequately provided for, or there would be cruel instead of kindness in taking her from her family. He thought of his own four children, of his twosons, of cousins in love, etc.;—but no sooner had he deliberately begun to state his objections, the Mrs. Norris interrupted him with a reply to them all, whether stated or not.

"My dear Sir Thomas, I perfectly comprehend you, and do justice to the generosity and delicacy your notions, which indeed are quite of a piece with your general conduct; and I entirely agree with you in the main as to the propriety of doing everything one could by way of providing for a child of had in a manner taken into one's own hands; and I am sure I should be the last person in the world withhold my mite upon such an occasion. Having no children of my own, who should I look to in a little matter I may ever have to bestow, but the children of my sisters?—and I am sure Mr. Norris is to just—but you know I am a woman of few words and professions. Do not let us be frightened from good deed by a trifle. Give a girl an education, and introduce her properly into the world, and ten one but she has the means of settling well, without farther expense to anybody. A niece of ours, S Thomas, I may say, or at least of yours, would not grow up in this neighbourhood without man advantages. I don't say she would be so handsome as her cousins. I dare say she would not; but so would be introduced into the society of this country under such very favourable circumstances as, all human probability, would get her a creditable establishment. You are thinking of your sons—but of not you know that, of all things upon earth, that is the least likely to happen, brought up as they wou be, always together like brothers and sisters? It is morally impossible. I never knew an instance of It is, in fact, the only sure way of providing against the connexion. Suppose her a pretty girl, and see by Tom or Edmund for the first time seven years hence, and I dare say there would be mischief. The very idea of her having been suffered to grow up at a distance from us all in poverty and neglect would be enough to make either of the dear, sweet-tempered boys in love with her. But breed her us with them from this time, and suppose her even to have the beauty of an angel, and she will never the more to either than a sister."

"There is a great deal of truth in what you say," replied Sir Thomas, "and far be it from me throw any fanciful impediment in the way of a plan which would be so consistent with the relativisituations of each. I only meant to observe that it ought not to be lightly engaged in, and that to make it really serviceable to Mrs. Price, and creditable to ourselves, we must secure to the child, or consider ourselves engaged to secure to her hereafter, as circumstances may arise, the provision of gentlewoman, if no such establishment should offer as you are so sanguine in expecting."

"I thoroughly understand you," cried Mrs. Norris, "you are everything that is generous at considerate, and I am sure we shall never disagree on this point. Whatever I can do, as you well know I am always ready enough to do for the good of those I love; and, though I could never feel for the little girl the hundredth part of the regard I bear your own dear children, nor consider her, in an respect, so much my own, I should hate myself if I were capable of neglecting her. Is not she a sister child? and could I bear to see her want while I had a bit of bread to give her? My dear Sir Thoma with all my faults I have a warm heart; and, poor as I am, would rather deny myself the necessaries life than do an ungenerous thing. So, if you are not against it, I will write to my poor sister tomorrow and make the proposal; and, as soon as matters are settled, I will engage to get the child to Mansfiel you shall have no trouble about it. My own trouble, you know, I never regard. I will send Nanny London on purpose, and she may have a bed at her cousin the saddler's, and the child be appointed meet her there. They may easily get her from Portsmouth to town by the coach, under the care of a creditable person that may chance to be going. I dare say there is always some reputable tradesman wife or other going up."

respectable, though less economical rendezvous being accordingly substituted, everything we considered as settled, and the pleasures of so benevolent a scheme were already enjoyed. The division of gratifying sensations ought not, in strict justice, to have been equal; for Sir Thomas was full resolved to be the real and consistent patron of the selected child, and Mrs. Norris had not the least intention of being at any expense whatever in her maintenance. As far as walking, talking, an contriving reached, she was thoroughly benevolent, and nobody knew better how to dictate liberality to others; but her love of money was equal to her love of directing, and she knew quite as well how save her own as to spend that of her friends. Having married on a narrower income than she had becaused to look forward to, she had, from the first, fancied a very strict line of economy necessary; as what was begun as a matter of prudence, soon grew into a matter of choice, as an object of that needs solicitude which there were no children to supply. Had there been a family to provide for, Mrs. Norr

Except to the attack on Nanny's cousin, Sir Thomas no longer made any objection, and a mo might never have saved her money; but having no care of that kind, there was nothing to impede he frugality, or lessen the comfort of making a yearly addition to an income which they had never live up to. Under this infatuating principle, counteracted by no real affection for her sister, it was impossible for her to aim at more than the credit of projecting and arranging so expensive a charit though perhaps she might so little know herself as to walk home to the Parsonage, after the conversation, in the happy belief of being the most liberal-minded sister and aunt in the world.

When the subject was brought forward again, her views were more fully explained; and, in reply Lady Bertram's calm inquiry of "Where shall the child come to first, sister, to you or to us?" So Thomas heard with some surprise that it would be totally out of Mrs. Norris's power to take any shall in the personal charge of her. He had been considering her as a particularly welcome addition at the Parsonage, as a desirable companion to an aunt who had no children of her own; but he found himse wholly mistaken. Mrs. Norris was sorry to say that the little girl's staying with them, at least as thing then were, was quite out of the question. Poor Mr. Norris's indifferent state of health made it a impossibility: he could no more bear the noise of a child than he could fly; if, indeed, he should ever get well of his gouty complaints, it would be a different matter: she should then be glad to take he turn, and think nothing of the inconvenience; but just now, poor Mr. Norris took up every moment therefore, and the very mention of such a thing she was sure would distract him.

"Then she had better come to us," said Lady Bertram, with the utmost composure. After a sho pause Sir Thomas added with dignity, "Yes, let her home be in this house. We will endeavour to do our duty by her, and she will, at least, have the advantage of companions of her own age, and of regular instructress."

"Very true," cried Mrs. Norris, "which are both very important considerations; and it will be ju the same to Miss Lee whether she has three girls to teach, or only two—there can be no difference only wish I could be more useful; but you see I do all in my power. I am not one of those that spatheir own trouble; and Nanny shall fetch her, however it may put me to inconvenience to have nother counsellor away for three days. I suppose, sister, you will put the child in the little white attinear the old nurseries. It will be much the best place for her, so near Miss Lee, and not far from the girls, and close by the housemaids, who could either of them help to dress her, you know, and tall care of her clothes, for I suppose you would not think it fair to expect Ellis to wait on her as well

Lady Bertram made no opposition.

"I hope she will prove a well-disposed girl," continued Mrs. Norris, "and be sensible of h uncommon good fortune in having such friends."

"Should her disposition be really bad," said Sir Thomas, "we must not, for our own children's sake the others. Indeed, I do not see that you could possibly place her anywhere else."

continue her in the family; but there is no reason to expect so great an evil. We shall probably so much to wish altered in her, and must prepare ourselves for gross ignorance, some meanness opinions, and very distressing vulgarity of manner; but these are not incurable faults; nor, I trust, can they be dangerous for her associates. Had my daughters been younger than herself, I should have considered the introduction of such a companion as a matter of very serious moment; but, as it is hope there can be nothing to fear for them, and everything to hope for her, from the association."

"That is exactly what I think," cried Mrs. Norris, "and what I was saying to my husband the morning. It will be an education for the child, said I, only being with her cousins; if Miss Lee taugher nothing, she would learn to be good and clever from them."

"I hope she will not tease my poor pug," said Lady Bertram; "I have but just got Julia to leave alone."

"There will be some difficulty in our way, Mrs. Norris," observed Sir Thomas, "as to the distinction proper to be made between the girls as they grow up: how to preserve in the minds of medaughters the consciousness of what they are, without making them think too lowly of their cousi and how, without depressing her spirits too far, to make her remember that she is not a Miss Bertran I should wish to see them very good friends, and would, on no account, authorise in my girls the smallest degree of arrogance towards their relation; but still they cannot be equals. Their ran fortune, rights, and expectations will always be different. It is a point of great delicacy, and you mut assist us in our endeavours to choose exactly the right line of conduct."

Mrs. Norris was quite at his service; and though she perfectly agreed with him as to its being most difficult thing, encouraged him to hope that between them it would be easily managed.

It will be readily believed that Mrs. Norris did not write to her sister in vain. Mrs. Price seems rather surprised that a girl should be fixed on, when she had so many fine boys, but accepted the off most thankfully, assuring them of her daughter's being a very well-disposed, good-humoured girl, at trusting they would never have cause to throw her off. She spoke of her farther as somewhat delicated and puny, but was sanguine in the hope of her being materially better for change of air. Poor woman she probably thought change of air might agree with many of her children.

Chapter 2

The little girl performed her long journey in safety; and at Northampton was met by Mrs. Norr who thus regaled in the credit of being foremost to welcome her, and in the importance of leading him to the others, and recommending her to their kindness.

Fanny Price was at this time just ten years old, and though there might not be much in her fir appearance to captivate, there was, at least, nothing to disgust her relations. She was small of her ag with no glow of complexion, nor any other striking beauty; exceedingly timid and shy, and shrinking from notice; but her air, though awkward, was not vulgar, her voice was sweet, and when she spoke her countenance was pretty. Sir Thomas and Lady Bertram received her very kindly; and Sir Thomas seeing how much she needed encouragement, tried to be all that was conciliating: but he had to wo against a most untoward gravity of deportment; and Lady Bertram, without taking half so much trouble, or speaking one word where he spoke ten, by the mere aid of a good-humoured smile, became immediately the less awful character of the two.

The young people were all at home, and sustained their share in the introduction very well, wi much good humour, and no embarrassment, at least on the part of the sons, who, at seventeen as sixteen, and tall of their age, had all the grandeur of men in the eyes of their little cousin. The two girls were more at a loss from being younger and in greater awe of their father, who addressed the on the occasion with rather an injudicious particularity. But they were too much used to company as praise to have anything like natural shyness; and their confidence increasing from their cousin's tot want of it, they were soon able to take a full survey of her face and her frock in easy indifference.

They were a remarkably fine family, the sons very well-looking, the daughters decided handsome, and all of them well-grown and forward of their age, which produced as striking difference between the cousins in person, as education had given to their address; and no one wou have supposed the girls so nearly of an age as they really were. There were in fact but two year between the youngest and Fanny. Julia Bertram was only twelve, and Maria but a year older. The litt visitor meanwhile was as unhappy as possible. Afraid of everybody, ashamed of herself, and longing for the home she had left, she knew not how to look up, and could scarcely speak to be heard, without crying. Mrs. Norris had been talking to her the whole way from Northampton of her wonderf good fortune, and the extraordinary degree of gratitude and good behaviour which it ought to produce and her consciousness of misery was therefore increased by the idea of its being a wicked thing for homotobe happy. The fatigue, too, of so long a journey, became soon no trifling evil. In vain were the well-meant condescensions of Sir Thomas, and all the officious prognostications of Mrs. Norris the she would be a good girl; in vain did Lady Bertram smile and make her sit on the sofa with herself and pug, and vain was even the sight of a gooseberry tart towards giving her comfort; she could scarce swallow two mouthfuls before tears interrupted her, and sleep seeming to be her likeliest friend, sleep was taken to finish her sorrows in bed.

"This is not a very promising beginning," said Mrs. Norris, when Fanny had left the room. "Aft all that I said to her as we came along, I thought she would have behaved better; I told her how much might depend upon her acquitting herself well at first. I wish there may not be a little sulkiness temper—her poor mother had a good deal; but we must make allowances for such a child—and I do n know that her being sorry to leave her home is really against her, for, with all its faults, it was h home, and she cannot as yet understand how much she has changed for the better; but then there moderation in all things."

It required a longer time, however, than Mrs. Norris was inclined to allow, to reconcile Fanny the novelty of Mansfield Park, and the separation from everybody she had been used to. Her feelin were very acute, and too little understood to be properly attended to. Nobody meant to be unkind, b nobody put themselves out of their way to secure her comfort.

The holiday allowed to the Miss Bertrams the next day, on purpose to afford leisure for getting acquainted with, and entertaining their young cousin, produced little union. They could not but how her cheap on finding that she had but two sashes, and had never learned French; and when the perceived her to be little struck with the duet they were so good as to play, they could do no more that make her a generous present of some of their least valued toys, and leave her to herself, while the adjourned to whatever might be the favourite holiday sport of the moment, making artificial flower or wasting gold paper.

Fanny, whether near or from her cousins, whether in the schoolroom, the drawing-room, or the shrubbery, was equally forlorn, finding something to fear in every person and place. She with disheartened by Lady Bertram's silence, awed by Sir Thomas's grave looks, and quite overcome has Mrs. Norris's admonitions. Her elder cousins mortified her by reflections on her size, and abashed has been described by the size of the size

Mrs. Norris's admonitions. Her elder cousins mortified her by reflections on her size, and abashed h by noticing her shyness: Miss Lee wondered at her ignorance, and the maid-servants sneered at h clothes; and when to these sorrows was added the idea of the brothers and sisters among whom sl had always been important as playfellow, instructress, and nurse, the despondence that sunk her litt heart was severe.

The grandeur of the house astonished, but could not console her. The rooms were too large for he to move in with ease: whatever she touched she expected to injure, and she crept about in constaterror of something or other; often retreating towards her own chamber to cry; and the little girl who was spoken of in the drawing-room when she left it at night as seeming so desirably sensible of he peculiar good fortune, ended every day's sorrows by sobbing herself to sleep. A week had passed this way, and no suspicion of it conveyed by her quiet passive manner, when she was found or morning by her cousin Edmund, the youngest of the sons, sitting crying on the attic stairs.

"My dear little cousin," said he, with all the gentleness of an excellent nature, "what can be the matter?" And sitting down by her, he was at great pains to overcome her shame in being so surprise and persuade her to speak openly. Was she ill? or was anybody angry with her? or had she quarrelle with Maria and Julia? or was she puzzled about anything in her lesson that he could explain? Did she in short, want anything he could possibly get her, or do for her? For a long while no answer could be obtained beyond a "no, no—not at all—no, thank you"; but he still persevered; and no sooner had begun to revert to her own home, than her increased sobs explained to him where the grievance lay. It tried to console her.

"You are sorry to leave Mama, my dear little Fanny," said he, "which shows you to be a very goo girl; but you must remember that you are with relations and friends, who all love you, and wish make you happy. Let us walk out in the park, and you shall tell me all about your brothers and sisters

On pursuing the subject, he found that, dear as all these brothers and sisters generally were, the was one among them who ran more in her thoughts than the rest. It was William whom she talked most, and wanted most to see. William, the eldest, a year older than herself, her constant companie and friend; her advocate with her mother (of whom he was the darling) in every distress. "William do not like she should come away; he had told her he should miss her very much indeed." "But William will write to you, I dare say." "Yes, he had promised he would, but he had told her to write first "And when shall you do it?" She hung her head and answered hesitatingly, "she did not know; she had not any paper."

"If that be all your difficulty, I will furnish you with paper and every other material, and you may write your letter whenever you choose. Would it make you happy to write to William?"

"Yes, very."

"Then let it be done now. Come with me into the breakfast-room, we shall find everything ther and be sure of having the room to ourselves."

"But, cousin, will it go to the post?"

"Yes, depend upon me it shall: it shall go with the other letters; and, as your uncle will frank it, will cost William nothing."

"My uncle!" repeated Fanny, with a frightened look.

"Yes, when you have written the letter, I will take it to my father to frank."

Fanny thought it a bold measure, but offered no further resistance; and they went together into the breakfast-room, where Edmund prepared her paper, and ruled her lines with all the goodwill that he brother could himself have felt, and probably with somewhat more exactness. He continued with here the whole time of her writing, to assist her with his penknife or his orthography, as either we wanted; and added to these attentions, which she felt very much, a kindness to her brother which delighted her beyond all the rest. He wrote with his own hand his love to his cousin William, and se him half a guinea under the seal. Fanny's feelings on the occasion were such as she believed herse incapable of expressing; but her countenance and a few artless words fully conveyed all their gratitue and delight, and her cousin began to find her an interesting object. He talked to her more, and, from a that she said, was convinced of her having an affectionate heart, and a strong desire of doing right; as he could perceive her to be farther entitled to attention by great sensibility of her situation, and great timidity. He had never knowingly given her pain, but he now felt that she required more positive kindness; and with that view endeavoured, in the first place, to lessen her fears of them all, and gas her especially a great deal of good advice as to playing with Maria and Julia, and being as merry possible.

cousin Edmund gave her better spirits with everybody else. The place became less strange, and the people less formidable; and if there were some amongst them whom she could not cease to fear, she began at least to know their ways, and to catch the best manner of conforming to them. The litt rusticities and awkwardnesses which had at first made grievous inroads on the tranquillity of all, an not least of herself, necessarily wore away, and she was no longer materially afraid to appear before uncle, nor did her aunt Norris's voice make her start very much. To her cousins she became occasionally an acceptable companion. Though unworthy, from inferiority of age and strength, to be their constant associate, their pleasures and schemes were sometimes of a nature to make a third very useful, especially when that third was of an obliging, yielding temper; and they could not but ow when their aunt inquired into her faults, or their brother Edmund urged her claims to their kindness that "Fanny was good-natured enough."

From this day Fanny grew more comfortable. She felt that she had a friend, and the kindness of h

Edmund was uniformly kind himself; and she had nothing worse to endure on the part of Tom that sort of merriment which a young man of seventeen will always think fair with a child of ten. It was just entering into life, full of spirits, and with all the liberal dispositions of an eldest son, where the seventeen only for expense and enjoyment. His kindness to his little cousin was consistent with his situation and rights: he made her some very pretty presents, and laughed at her.

As her appearance and spirits improved, Sir Thomas and Mrs. Norris thought with great satisfaction of their benevolent plan; and it was pretty soon decided between them that, though for the from clever, she showed a tractable disposition, and seemed likely to give them little trouble. A mean opinion of her abilities was not confined to them. Fanny could read, work, and write, but she had be taught nothing more; and as her cousins found her ignorant of many things with which they had be long familiar, they thought her prodigiously stupid, and for the first two or three weeks we continually bringing some fresh report of it into the drawing-room. "Dear mama, only think, no cousin cannot put the map of Europe together—or my cousin cannot tell the principal rivers in Russia or, she never heard of Asia Minor—or she does not know the difference between water-colours are

"My dear," their considerate aunt would reply, "it is very bad, but you must not expect everyboo crayons!—How strange!—Did you ever hear anything so stupid?"

to be as forward and quick at learning as yourself."

messages, and fetching what she wanted."

"But, aunt, she is really so very ignorant!—Do you know, we asked her last night which way should go to get to Ireland; and she said, she should cross to the Isle of Wight. She thinks of nothing but the Isle of Wight, and she calls it the Island, as if there were no other island in the world. I am su I should have been ashamed of myself, if I had not known better long before I was so old as she is cannot remember the time when I did not know a great deal that she has not the least notion of you how long ago it is, aunt, since we used to repeat the chronological order of the kings of England, with the dates of their accession, and most of the principal events of their reigns!"

"Yes," added the other; "and of the Roman emperors as low as Severus; besides a great deal of the heathen mythology, and all the metals, semi-metals, planets, and distinguished philosophers."

"Very true indeed, my dears, but you are blessed with wonderful memories, and your poor coust has probably none at all. There is a vast deal of difference in memories, as well as in everything else and therefore you must make allowance for your cousin, and pity her deficiency. And remember that if you are ever so forward and clever yourselves, you should always be modest; for, much as you know already, there is a great deal more for you to learn."

"Yes, I know there is, till I am seventeen. But I must tell you another thing of Fanny, so odd and s stupid. Do you know, she says she does not want to learn either music or drawing."

"To be sure, my dear, that is very stupid indeed, and shows a great want of genius and emulation But, all things considered, I do not know whether it is not as well that it should be so, for, though you know (owing to me) your papa and mama are so good as to bring her up with you, it is not at a necessary that she should be as accomplished as you are;—on the contrary, it is much more desirabthat there should be a difference."

Such were the counsels by which Mrs. Norris assisted to form her nieces' minds; and it is not very wonderful that, with all their promising talents and early information, they should be entirely deficied in the less common acquirements of self-knowledge, generosity and humility. In everything be disposition they were admirably taught. Sir Thomas did not know what was wanting, because, though a truly anxious father, he was not outwardly affectionate, and the reserve of his manner repressed at the flow of their spirits before him.

To the education of her daughters Lady Bertram paid not the smallest attention. She had not tin for such cares. She was a woman who spent her days in sitting, nicely dressed, on a sofa, doing son long piece of needlework, of little use and no beauty, thinking more of her pug than her children, be very indulgent to the latter when it did not put herself to inconvenience, guided in everything important by Sir Thomas, and in smaller concerns by her sister. Had she possessed greater leisure for the service of her girls, she would probably have supposed it unnecessary, for they were under the case of a governess, with proper masters, and could want nothing more. As for Fanny's being stupid learning, "she could only say it was very unlucky, but some people were stupid, and Fanny must take more pains: she did not know what else was to be done; and, except her being so dull, she must as she saw no harm in the poor little thing, and always found her very handy and quick in carrying transfer in its favour much of her attachment to her former home, grew up there not unhappily amonher cousins. There was no positive ill-nature in Maria or Julia; and though Fanny was often mortific by their treatment of her, she thought too lowly of her own claims to feel injured by it.

Fanny, with all her faults of ignorance and timidity, was fixed at Mansfield Park, and learning

From about the time of her entering the family, Lady Bertram, in consequence of a little ill-healt and a great deal of indolence, gave up the house in town, which she had been used to occupy ever spring, and remained wholly in the country, leaving Sir Thomas to attend his duty in Parliament, wire whatever increase or diminution of comfort might arise from her absence. In the country, therefore the Miss Bertrams continued to exercise their memories, practise their duets, and grow tall and womanly: and their father saw them becoming in person, manner, and accomplishments, everything that could satisfy his anxiety. His eldest son was careless and extravagant, and had already given his much uneasiness; but his other children promised him nothing but good. His daughters, he felt, whis they retained the name of Bertram, must be giving it new grace, and in quitting it, he trusted, wou extend its respectable alliances; and the character of Edmund, his strong good sense and uprightness of mind, bid most fairly for utility, honour, and happiness to himself and all his connexions. He was a clergyman.

Amid the cares and the complacency which his own children suggested, Sir Thomas did not forg to do what he could for the children of Mrs. Price: he assisted her liberally in the education and disposal of her sons as they became old enough for a determinate pursuit; and Fanny, though almost totally separated from her family, was sensible of the truest satisfaction in hearing of any kindne towards them, or of anything at all promising in their situation or conduct. Once, and once only, in the course of many years, had she the happiness of being with William. Of the rest she saw nothin nobody seemed to think of her ever going amongst them again, even for a visit, nobody at hom seemed to want her; but William determining, soon after her removal, to be a sailor, was invited spend a week with his sister in Northamptonshire before he went to sea. Their eager affection meeting, their exquisite delight in being together, their hours of happy mirth, and moments of serior conference, may be imagined; as well as the sanguine views and spirits of the boy even to the last, at the misery of the girl when he left her. Luckily the visit happened in the Christmas holidays, when should directly look for comfort to her cousin Edmund; and he told her such charming things of whe William was to do, and be hereafter, in consequence of his profession, as made her gradually admithat the separation might have some use. Edmund's friendship never failed her: his leaving Eton for Oxford made no change in his kind dispositions, and only afforded more frequent opportunities

Kept back as she was by everybody else, his single support could not bring her forward; but he attentions were otherwise of the highest importance in assisting the improvement of her mind, as extending its pleasures. He knew her to be clever, to have a quick apprehension as well as good sens and a fondness for reading, which, properly directed, must be an education in itself. Miss Lee taugher French, and heard her read the daily portion of history; but he recommended the books which advice, consolation, and encouragement.

proving them. Without any display of doing more than the rest, or any fear of doing too much, he was always true to her interests, and considerate of her feelings, trying to make her good qualiti understood, and to conquer the diffidence which prevented their being more apparent; giving her charmed her leisure hours, he encouraged her taste, and corrected her judgment: he made reading useful by talking to her of what she read, and heightened its attraction by judicious praise. In returning to such services she loved him better than anybody in the world except William: her heart world divided between the two.

Chapter 3

The first event of any importance in the family was the death of Mr. Norris, which happened who Fanny was about fifteen, and necessarily introduced alterations and novelties. Mrs. Norris, on quitting the Parsonage, removed first to the Park, and afterwards to a small house of Sir Thomas's in the village, and consoled herself for the loss of her husband by considering that she could do very we without him; and for her reduction of income by the evident necessity of stricter economy.

The living was hereafter for Edmund; and, had his uncle died a few years sooner, it would have been duly given to some friend to hold till he were old enough for orders. But Tom's extravagance had, previous to that event, been so great as to render a different disposal of the next presentation necessary, and the younger brother must help to pay for the pleasures of the elder. There was another family living actually held for Edmund; but though this circumstance had made the arrangeme somewhat easier to Sir Thomas's conscience, he could not but feel it to be an act of injustice, and learnestly tried to impress his eldest son with the same conviction, in the hope of its producing a bett effect than anything he had yet been able to say or do.

"I blush for you, Tom," said he, in his most dignified manner; "I blush for the expedient which am driven on, and I trust I may pity your feelings as a brother on the occasion. You have robbe Edmund for ten, twenty, thirty years, perhaps for life, of more than half the income which ought to his. It may hereafter be in my power, or in yours (I hope it will), to procure him better preferment; be it must not be forgotten that no benefit of that sort would have been beyond his natural claims on u and that nothing can, in fact, be an equivalent for the certain advantage which he is now obliged forego through the urgency of your debts."

Tom listened with some shame and some sorrow; but escaping as quickly as possible, could so with cheerful selfishness reflect, firstly, that he had not been half so much in debt as some of he friends; secondly, that his father had made a most tiresome piece of work of it; and, thirdly, that the future incumbent, whoever he might be, would, in all probability, die very soon.

On Mr. Norris's death the presentation became the right of a Dr. Grant, who came consequently reside at Mansfield; and on proving to be a hearty man of forty-five, seemed likely to disappoint M. Bertram's calculations. But "no, he was a short-necked, apoplectic sort of fellow, and, plied well wire good things, would soon pop off."

He had a wife about fifteen years his junior, but no children; and they entered the neighbourhoowith the usual fair report of being very respectable, agreeable people.

The time was now come when Sir Thomas expected his sister-in-law to claim her share in the niece, the change in Mrs. Norris's situation, and the improvement in Fanny's age, seeming not mere to do away any former objection to their living together, but even to give it the most decide eligibility; and as his own circumstances were rendered less fair than heretofore, by some rece losses on his West India estate, in addition to his eldest son's extravagance, it became not undesirable to himself to be relieved from the expense of her support, and the obligation of her future provision. the fullness of his belief that such a thing must be, he mentioned its probability to his wife; and the first time of the subject's occurring to her again happening to be when Fanny was present, she calm observed to her, "So, Fanny, you are going to leave us, and live with my sister. How shall you like it?

Fanny was too much surprised to do more than repeat her aunt's words, "Going to leave you?"

"Yes, my dear; why should you be astonished? You have been five years with us, and my sisted always meant to take you when Mr. Norris died. But you must come up and tack on my patterns all the same."

The news was as disagreeable to Fanny as it had been unexpected. She had never received kindne from her aunt Norris, and could not love her.

"I shall be very sorry to go away," said she, with a faltering voice.

"Yes, I dare say you will; that's natural enough. I suppose you have had as little to vex you since you came into this house as any creature in the world."

"I hope I am not ungrateful, aunt," said Fanny modestly.

"No, my dear; I hope not. I have always found you a very good girl."

"And am I never to live here again?"

"Never, my dear; but you are sure of a comfortable home. It can make very little difference to yo whether you are in one house or the other."

Fanny left the room with a very sorrowful heart; she could not feel the difference to be so sma she could not think of living with her aunt with anything like satisfaction. As soon as she met wi Edmund she told him her distress.

"Cousin," said she, "something is going to happen which I do not like at all; and though you has often persuaded me into being reconciled to things that I disliked at first, you will not be able to do now. I am going to live entirely with my aunt Norris."

"Indeed!"

"Yes; my aunt Bertram has just told me so. It is quite settled. I am to leave Mansfield Park, and § to the White House, I suppose, as soon as she is removed there."

"Well, Fanny, and if the plan were not unpleasant to you, I should call it an excellent one."

"Oh, cousin!"

"It has everything else in its favour. My aunt is acting like a sensible woman in wishing for you She is choosing a friend and companion exactly where she ought, and I am glad her love of mondoes not interfere. You will be what you ought to be to her. I hope it does not distress you very much Fanny?"

"Indeed it does: I cannot like it. I love this house and everything in it: I shall love nothing then You know how uncomfortable I feel with her."

"I can say nothing for her manner to you as a child; but it was the same with us all, or nearly so She never knew how to be pleasant to children. But you are now of an age to be treated better; I thin she is behaving better already; and when you are her only companion, you must be important to her."

"I can never be important to any one."

"What is to prevent you?"

"Everything. My situation, my foolishness and awkwardness."

"As to your foolishness and awkwardness, my dear Fanny, believe me, you never have a shadow either, but in using the words so improperly. There is no reason in the world why you should not important where you are known. You have good sense, and a sweet temper, and I am sure you have grateful heart, that could never receive kindness without wishing to return it. I do not know any bett qualifications for a friend and companion."

"You are too kind," said Fanny, colouring at such praise; "how shall I ever thank you as I ough for thinking so well of me. Oh! cousin, if I am to go away, I shall remember your goodness to the lamoment of my life."

"Why, indeed, Fanny, I should hope to be remembered at such a distance as the White House. Yo speak as if you were going two hundred miles off instead of only across the park; but you will below to us almost as much as ever. The two families will be meeting every day in the year. The on difference will be that, living with your aunt, you will necessarily be brought forward as you ought be. Here there are too many whom you can hide behind; but with her you will be forced to speak f yourself."

"Oh! I do not say so."

"I must say it, and say it with pleasure. Mrs. Norris is much better fitted than my mother f having the charge of you now. She is of a temper to do a great deal for anybody she really interes herself about, and she will force you to do justice to your natural powers."

Fanny sighed, and said, "I cannot see things as you do; but I ought to believe you to be right rath than myself, and I am very much obliged to you for trying to reconcile me to what must be. If I cou suppose my aunt really to care for me, it would be delightful to feel myself of consequence anybody. Here, I know, I am of none, and yet I love the place so well."

"The place, Fanny, is what you will not quit, though you quit the house. You will have as free command of the park and gardens as ever. Even your constant little heart need not take fright at such nominal change. You will have the same walks to frequent, the same library to choose from, the same people to look at, the same horse to ride."

"Very true. Yes, dear old grey pony! Ah! cousin, when I remember how much I used to drea riding, what terrors it gave me to hear it talked of as likely to do me good (oh! how I have trembled my uncle's opening his lips if horses were talked of), and then think of the kind pains you took reason and persuade me out of my fears, and convince me that I should like it after a little while, as feel how right you proved to be, I am inclined to hope you may always prophesy as well."

"And I am quite convinced that your being with Mrs. Norris will be as good for your mind riding has been for your health, and as much for your ultimate happiness too."

So ended their discourse, which, for any very appropriate service it could render Fanny, might well have been spared, for Mrs. Norris had not the smallest intention of taking her. It had nev occurred to her, on the present occasion, but as a thing to be carefully avoided. To prevent its being expected, she had fixed on the smallest habitation which could rank as genteel among the buildings Mansfield parish, the White House being only just large enough to receive herself and her servant and allow a spare room for a friend, of which she made a very particular point. The spare rooms at the Parsonage had never been wanted, but the absolute necessity of a spare room for a friend was not never forgotten. Not all her precautions, however, could save her from being suspected of something better; or, perhaps, her very display of the importance of a spare room might have misled Sir Thom to suppose it really intended for Fanny. Lady Bertram soon brought the matter to a certainty learned carelessly observing to Mrs. Norris-

"I think, sister, we need not keep Miss Lee any longer, when Fanny goes to live with you."

Mrs. Norris almost started. "Live with me, dear Lady Bertram! what do you mean?"

"Is she not to live with you? I thought you had settled it with Sir Thomas."

"Me! never. I never spoke a syllable about it to Sir Thomas, nor he to me. Fanny live with me! the last thing in the world for me to think of, or for anybody to wish that really knows us both. God heaven! what could I do with Fanny? Me! a poor, helpless, forlorn widow, unfit for anything, me spirits quite broke down; what could I do with a girl at her time of life? A girl of fifteen! the very agon all others to need most attention and care, and put the cheerfullest spirits to the test! Sure Signals Thomas could not seriously expect such a thing! Sir Thomas is too much my friend. Nobody the wishes me well, I am sure, would propose it. How came Sir Thomas to speak to you about it?"

"Indeed, I do not know. I suppose he thought it best."

"But what did he say? He could not say he wished me to take Fanny. I am sure in his heart he cou not wish me to do it."

"No; he only said he thought it very likely; and I thought so too. We both thought it would be comfort to you. But if you do not like it, there is no more to be said. She is no encumbrance here."

"Dear sister, if you consider my unhappy state, how can she be any comfort to me? Here am I, poor desolate widow, deprived of the best of husbands, my health gone in attending and nursing hir my spirits still worse, all my peace in this world destroyed, with hardly enough to support me in the rank of a gentlewoman, and enable me to live so as not to disgrace the memory of the dear departed what possible comfort could I have in taking such a charge upon me as Fanny? If I could wish it f my own sake, I would not do so unjust a thing by the poor girl. She is in good hands, and sure of doin well. I must struggle through my sorrows and difficulties as I can."

"Then you will not mind living by yourself quite alone?"

"Lady Bertram, I do not complain. I know I cannot live as I have done, but I must retrench where can, and learn to be a better manager. I have been a liberal housekeeper enough, but I shall not lashamed to practise economy now. My situation is as much altered as my income. A great mar things were due from poor Mr. Norris, as clergyman of the parish, that cannot be expected from me. is unknown how much was consumed in our kitchen by odd comers and goers. At the White House matters must be better looked after. I must live within my income, or I shall be miserable; and I own would give me great satisfaction to be able to do rather more, to lay by a little at the end of the year."

"I dare say you will. You always do, don't you?"

"My object, Lady Bertram, is to be of use to those that come after me. It is for your children good that I wish to be richer. I have nobody else to care for, but I should be very glad to think I couleave a little trifle among them worth their having."

"You are very good, but do not trouble yourself about them. They are sure of being well provide for. Sir Thomas will take care of that."

"Why, you know, Sir Thomas's means will be rather straitened if the Antigua estate is to make such poor returns."

thousand pounds."

"Oh! that will soon be settled. Sir Thomas has been writing about it, I know."

"Well, Lady Bertram," said Mrs. Norris, moving to go, "I can only say that my sole desire is to be of use to your family: and so, if Sir Thomas should ever speak again about my taking Fanny, you we be able to say that my health and spirits put it quite out of the question; besides that, I really shou not have a bed to give her, for I must keep a spare room for a friend."

Lady Bertram repeated enough of this conversation to her husband to convince him how much had mistaken his sister-in-law's views; and she was from that moment perfectly safe from a expectation, or the slightest allusion to it from him. He could not but wonder at her refusing to anything for a niece whom she had been so forward to adopt; but, as she took early care to make him as well as Lady Bertram, understand that whatever she possessed was designed for their family, had soon grew reconciled to a distinction which, at the same time that it was advantageous and complimentary to them, would enable him better to provide for Fanny himself.

Fanny soon learnt how unnecessary had been her fears of a removal; and her spontaneous, untaug felicity on the discovery, conveyed some consolation to Edmund for his disappointment in what had expected to be so essentially serviceable to her. Mrs. Norris took possession of the White House the Grants arrived at the Parsonage, and these events over, everything at Mansfield went on for son time as usual.

The Grants showing a disposition to be friendly and sociable, gave great satisfaction in the ma among their new acquaintance. They had their faults, and Mrs. Norris soon found them out. To Doctor was very fond of eating, and would have a good dinner every day; and Mrs. Grant, instead contriving to gratify him at little expense, gave her cook as high wages as they did at Mansfield Parand was scarcely ever seen in her offices. Mrs. Norris could not speak with any temper of sugrievances, nor of the quantity of butter and eggs that were regularly consumed in the house. "Noboc loved plenty and hospitality more than herself; nobody more hated pitiful doings; the Parsonage, stolelieved, had never been wanting in comforts of any sort, had never borne a bad character in her time but this was a way of going on that she could not understand. A fine lady in a country parsonage was quite out of place. Her store-room, she thought, might have been good enough for Mrs. Grant to ginto. Inquire where she would, she could not find out that Mrs. Grant had ever had more than fire

Lady Bertram listened without much interest to this sort of invective. She could not enter into the wrongs of an economist, but she felt all the injuries of beauty in Mrs. Grant's being so well settled life without being handsome, and expressed her astonishment on that point almost as often, though no so diffusely, as Mrs. Norris discussed the other.

These opinions had been hardly canvassed a year before another event arose of such importance the family, as might fairly claim some place in the thoughts and conversation of the ladies. Some the thought it expedient to go to Antigua himself, for the better arrangement of his affairs, and look his eldest son with him, in the hope of detaching him from some bad connexions at home. The left England with the probability of being nearly a twelvemonth absent.

The necessity of the measure in a pecuniary light, and the hope of its utility to his son, reconcile

Sir Thomas to the effort of quitting the rest of his family, and of leaving his daughters to the direction of others at their present most interesting time of life. He could not think Lady Bertram quite equal supply his place with them, or rather, to perform what should have been her own; but, in Mrs. Norris watchful attention, and in Edmund's judgment, he had sufficient confidence to make him go without fears for their conduct.

Lady Bertram did not at all like to have her husband leave her; but she was not disturbed by a alarm for his safety, or solicitude for his comfort, being one of those persons who think nothing can langerous, or difficult, or fatiguing to anybody but themselves.

The Miss Bertrams were much to be pitied on the occasion: not for their sorrow, but for their wa of it. Their father was no object of love to them; he had never seemed the friend of their pleasures, and his absence was unhappily most welcome. They were relieved by it from all restraint; and without aiming at one gratification that would probably have been forbidden by Sir Thomas, they fe themselves immediately at their own disposal, and to have every indulgence within their reac Fanny's relief, and her consciousness of it, were quite equal to her cousins'; but a more tender natu suggested that her feelings were ungrateful, and she really grieved because she could not grieve. "S Thomas, who had done so much for her and her brothers, and who was gone perhaps never to retur that she should see him go without a tear! it was a shameful insensibility." He had said to he moreover, on the very last morning, that he hoped she might see William again in the course of the ensuing winter, and had charged her to write and invite him to Mansfield as soon as the squadron which he belonged should be known to be in England. "This was so thoughtful and kind!" and wou he only have smiled upon her, and called her "my dear Fanny," while he said it, every former frown cold address might have been forgotten. But he had ended his speech in a way to sink her in sa mortification, by adding, "If William does come to Mansfield, I hope you may be able to convince him that the many years which have passed since you parted have not been spent on your side entire without improvement; though, I fear, he must find his sister at sixteen in some respects too much lil his sister at ten." She cried bitterly over this reflection when her uncle was gone; and her cousins, or seeing her with red eyes, set her down as a hypocrite.

Chapter 4

Tom Bertram had of late spent so little of his time at home that he could be only nominal missed; and Lady Bertram was soon astonished to find how very well they did even without his father how well Edmund could supply his place in carving, talking to the steward, writing to the attornes settling with the servants, and equally saving her from all possible fatigue or exertion in every particular but that of directing her letters.

The earliest intelligence of the travellers' safe arrival at Antigua, after a favourable voyage, we received; though not before Mrs. Norris had been indulging in very dreadful fears, and trying to make Edmund participate them whenever she could get him alone; and as she depended on being the first person made acquainted with any fatal catastrophe, she had already arranged the manner of breaking to all the others, when Sir Thomas's assurances of their both being alive and well made it necessary lay by her agitation and affectionate preparatory speeches for a while.

The winter came and passed without their being called for; the accounts continued perfectly goo and Mrs. Norris, in promoting gaieties for her nieces, assisting their toilets, displaying the accomplishments, and looking about for their future husbands, had so much to do as, in addition to a her own household cares, some interference in those of her sister, and Mrs. Grant's wasteful doings overlook, left her very little occasion to be occupied in fears for the absent.

The Miss Bertrams were now fully established among the belles of the neighbourhood; and as the joined to beauty and brilliant acquirements a manner naturally easy, and carefully formed to gener civility and obligingness, they possessed its favour as well as its admiration. Their vanity was in suggood order that they seemed to be quite free from it, and gave themselves no airs; while the prais attending such behaviour, secured and brought round by their aunt, served to strengthen them believing they had no faults.

Lady Bertram did not go into public with her daughters. She was too indolent even to accept mother's gratification in witnessing their success and enjoyment at the expense of any person trouble, and the charge was made over to her sister, who desired nothing better than a post of such honourable representation, and very thoroughly relished the means it afforded her of mixing in socie without having horses to hire.

Fanny had no share in the festivities of the season; but she enjoyed being avowedly useful as haunt's companion when they called away the rest of the family; and, as Miss Lee had left Mansfiel she naturally became everything to Lady Bertram during the night of a ball or a party. She talked her, listened to her, read to her; and the tranquillity of such evenings, her perfect security in such tete-a-tete from any sound of unkindness, was unspeakably welcome to a mind which had seldo known a pause in its alarms or embarrassments. As to her cousins' gaieties, she loved to hear a account of them, especially of the balls, and whom Edmund had danced with; but thought too lowly her own situation to imagine she should ever be admitted to the same, and listened, therefore, without it brought no William to England, the never-failing hope of his arrival was worth much.

sample content of Mansfield Park (Illustrated Edition) (The Novels of Jane Austen)

- read Traités 22 -26 online
- Red River (BFI Film Classics) pdf, azw (kindle)
- Citizen's Income and Welfare Regimes in Latin America: From Cash Transfers to Rights for free
- Encounter With the Self: William Blake's Illustrations of the Book of Job pdf, azw (kindle)
- The Times Were a Changin': The Sixties Reader pdf
- http://interactmg.com/ebooks/Trait--s-22--26.pdf
- http://www.mmastyles.com/books/Direct-Action--Memoirs-of-an-Urban-Guerrilla.pdf
- http://reseauplatoparis.com/library/Temptation-s-Kiss.pdf
- http://yachtwebsitedemo.com/books/Sunshine.pdf
- http://metromekanik.com/ebooks/The-Times-Were-a-Changin---The-Sixties-Reader.pdf