

#1 NEW YORK TIMES BESTSELLING AUTHOR

JONATHAN KELLERMAN

Author of Guilt

THE A NOVEL

BUTCHER'S THEATER

THE BUTCHER'S THEATER

A Novel

Jonathan Kellerman

BALLANTINE BOOKS

•

NEW YORK

The Butcher's Theater is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously.

Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is entirely coincidental.

2013 Ballantine Books Premium Mass Market Edition

Copyright © 1988 by Jonathan Kellerman

Excerpt from Guilt copyright © 2012 by Jonathan Kellerman

All rights reserved.

Published in the United States by Ballantine Books, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House, Inc., New York, New York.

BALLANTINE and colophon are registered trademarks of Random House, Inc.

Originally published in hardcover in the United States by Bantam Books, an imprint of The Random House Publishing Group, a division of Random House, Inc., in 1988.

eISBN: 978-0-345-46373-9

Cover design: Marc J. Cohen

Cover image: S David Mor/Flickr/Getty Images

www.ballantinebooks.com

v3.0_r1

For Faye

Sincere and profound thanks to Eli Ben Aharon, Eli Bichler, Peter Guzzardi, Eran Israel, Barney Karpfinger, Baruch Ram, and Robert Rosenberg. And to Jesse, Rachel, and Ilana for being such exemplary travelers.

CONTENTS

Title Page

Copyright Page

Dedication

Acknowledgments

Israeli Police Ranks

BOOK ONE

Chapter 1

Chapter 2

Chapter 3

Chapter 4

Chapter 5

Chapter 6

Chapter 7

Chapter 8

Chapter 9

Chapter 10

Chapter 11

Chapter 12

Chapter 13

Chapter 14

Chapter 15

Chapter 16

Chapter 17

Chapter 18

Chapter 19

Chapter 20

Chapter 21

Chapter 22

Chapter 23

BOOK TWO

Chapter 24

Chapter 25

Chapter 26

Chapter 27

Chapter 28

Chapter 29

Chapter 30

Chapter 31

Chapter 32

Chapter 33

Chapter 34

Chapter 35

Chapter 36

Chapter 37

Chapter 38

Chapter 39

Chapter 40

Chapter 41

Chapter 42

Chapter 43

Chapter 44

Chapter 45

Chapter 46

Chapter 47

Chapter 48

Chapter 49

Chapter 50

Chapter 51

Chapter 52

Chapter 53

Chapter 54

BOOK THREE

Chapter 55

Chapter 56

Chapter 57

Chapter 58

Chapter 59

Chapter 60

Chapter 61

Chapter 62

Chapter 63

Chapter 64

Chapter 65

Chapter 66

Chapter 67

Chapter 68

Chapter 69

Chapter 70

Chapter 71

Chapter 72

Chapter 73

Chapter 74

Other Books by this author

Excerpt from Guilt

ISRAELI POLICE RANKS

Rav nitzav:	Commissioner
Nitzav:	Commander
Tat nitzav:	Deputy commander
Nitzav mishneh:	Assistant commander
Sgan nitzav:	Chief superintendent
Rav pakad:	Superintendent
Pakad:	Chief inspector
Mefakeah:	Inspector
Mefakeah mishneh:	Subinspector
Sgan mefakeah:	Deputy inspector
Rav samal rishon:	Staff sergeant major
Rav samal:	Sergeant major
Samal rishon:	Sergeant
Samal sheni:	Corporal
Rav shoter:	Lance corporal
Tura'i:	Rookie

BOOK ONE

CHAPTER

1

Spring 1985

Yaakov Schlesinger could think only of food.

Idiot, he told himself. Immersed in such beauty and unable to take your mind off your belly.

Unclipping his flashlight from his belt, he beamed it briefly on the southern gate of the campus. Satisfied that the lock was in place, he hitched up his trousers and trudged forward in the darkness, determined to ignore the gnawing from within.

The Mount Scopus Road climbed suddenly, but it was a rise that he knew well—what was this, his two hundredth patrol?—and he remained sure-footed. Veering to the left, he walked toward the eastern ridge and looked out, with a pleasurable sense of vertigo, at nothingness: the unlit expanse of the Judean wilderness. In less than an hour dawn would break and sunlight would flood the desert like honeyed porridge dripping thickly into an earthenware bowl . . . ach, there it was again. Food.

Still, he rationalized, a bowl was exactly what it looked like to him. Or maybe a dinner plate. A broad, concave disk of desert, chalky-white, seamed with copper, dotted by mesquite and pocked with caves—a gigantic cracked dinner plate tipping into the Dead Sea. Any terrorist foolish enough to try to cross the wilderness would be as conspicuous as a fly on paper, certain to be spotted by the Border Patrol long before reaching the Ma'ale Adumi settlement. Which made his job, he supposed, little more than a formality. An old man's assignment.

He absently touched the butt of the M-1 carbine strapped over his shoulder and experienced a sudden rush of memories. A twinge of melancholy that he suppressed by telling himself he had nothing to complain about. That he should be thankful for the opportunity to volunteer. Grateful for the nightly exercise, the cool, fragrant air. Proud of the slap of the M-1 against his shoulder blades, the crisp Hagah uniform that made him feel like a soldier again.

A scurrying sound crackled somewhere beyond the ridge and caused his heart to jump. He pulled the carbine down, held it in both hands, and waited. Silence, then another scurry, this time easy to classify: the frantic dash of a rodent or shrew. Letting out his breath, he kept his right hand clamped around the M-1, took the flashlight in his left, and skimmed the beam over the brush. The light caught only rocks and shrubs. A clump of weeds. A filmy swirl of night-flying insects.

Stepping away from the ridge, he commenced walking south. The barrenness of the road was broken at the crest by a stolid, many-roofed mass huddled around a high, peaked tower—the Amelia Catherine Hospital, arrogantly colonial on this Levantine stretch of mountaintop. Because the hospital compound was U.N. property, it was excluded from his route, but sometimes he liked to stop and take a break just outside the grounds. Smoke a cigarette and watch as the odor of Turkish tobacco stirred the goats and donkeys penned behind the main building. Why, he wondered, were the Arabs allowed to keep animals there? What did they say for the hygiene of the place?

His stomach growled. Absurd. He'd eaten a hearty dinner at eight, spent the next four hours sitting on the balcony while slowly ingesting the food Eva set out for him before she went to bed: dried apricots and apples, a string of fat Calimyrna figs, tea wafers, lemon cookies, marzipan, tangerines and kumquats, toasted gar'inim, jagged chunks of bittersweet chocolate, jelly candies, halvah. Topped off by an entire liter bottle of grapefruit juice and a Siphon full of soda—the last in hopes that gas bubbles might accomplish what solid matter had failed to do: fill him up. No such luck.

He'd lived with his hunger—and its accomplice, insomnia—for more than forty years. Long enough to think of them as a pair of living, breathing creatures. Abdominal homunculi implanted by the bastards at Dachau. Twin demons who scraped away at his peace of mind, evoking constant misery. True, it wasn't cancer, but neither was it trivial.

The pain fluctuated. At best, a dull, maddeningly abstract hollowness; at worst, real grinding agony, as if an iron hand were clamped around his vitals.

No one took him seriously anymore. Eva said he was fortunate to be able to eat whatever he wanted and remain skinny. This, as she pinched the soft ring around her own thickening waistline and examined the latest diet brochure handed out at the Kupat Holim clinic. And the doctors delighted in telling him there was nothing wrong with him. That the experiment had left no tangible scars. He was a superb specimen, they insisted, possessing the alimentary tract, and general constitution, of a man twenty years younger.

"You're seventy years old, Mr. Schlesinger," one of them had explained before settling back with a self-satisfied smirk on his face. As if that settled it. An active metabolism, another had pronounced. "Be thankful you're as active as you are, adoni." Still another had listened with apparent sympathy, raising his hopes, then dashing them by suggesting that he visit the Psychiatric Faculty at Hadassah. Which only illustrated that the man was just another civilian service idiot—the gnawing was in his belly, not his head. He vowed to cease all dealings with the clinic and find himself a private doctor, cost be damned. Someone who could understand what it was like to feel as if you were starving amid plenty, who could appreciate the bottomless ache that had plagued him since the Americans had discovered him, a bare-breasted breathing skeleton, lying limply atop a mound of stinking, broken corpses . . .

Enough, fool. Ancient history. You're free, now. A soldier. The man in charge, armed and masterful. Privileged to patrol the most beautiful of cities at the most beautiful of hours. To watch her awaken, bathed in lavender and scarlet light, like a princess rising from a bed canopied with silk . . .

Schlesinger the poet.

He took a deep breath, filled his nostrils with the sharp perfume of Jerusalem pine, and turned away from the looming silhouette of the hospital. Exhaling slowly, he gazed out over the steeply sloping terraces of Wadi el Joz, toward the view from the southwest, the one always saved for last:

The Old City, backlit in amber, turrets and battlements stitching a flame-colored he across the pure black sky. Beyond the walls, faint shadowy contours of domes, spire steeples, and minarets. At the southern end the vertical thrust of The Citadel. Dominating th north, the Haram esh-Sharif plateau, upon which sat the Great Mosque of the Rock, its golde dome burnished rosy in the half-light, nestled within the sleeping city like a brooch cradled gray velvet.

Immersed in beauty like that, how could he think of his belly? And yet, the ache ha intensified, quickened, taken on a pulse of its own.

Angry, he picked up his pace and crossed the road. Just off the asphalt was a shallow gul leading to the empty fields that anticipated the wadi. Casually, he ran the flashlight ove familiar terrain. The same damned contours, the same damned shadows. This olive tree, th row of border stones. The rusty abandoned water heater that had been there for month glints of broken glass, the sharp stink of sheep dung . . .

And something else.

An oblong shape, maybe a meter and a half long, tucked into a terraced pocket near the to of the north wall of the gully. Lying inert at the base of an olive sapling. Unmoving. A bomb His instinctive answer was no—it looked too soft. But one couldn't be too careful.

As he considered his options, his arm began to move, seemingly of its own volitio sweeping the flashlight beam over the shape. Up and down, back and forth. This wa definitely something new. Striped? No, two tones of fabric. Dark over light. A blanket ove sheeting. A shroud. Glistening wet and dark around the edges.

The light continued to wash across the gully. Nothing. No one. He considered calling fo help, decided it would be needlessly alarmist. Better to check first.

Carbine in hand, he inched to the rim of the gully, began climbing down, then stopped, le suddenly leaden. Short of breath. Fatigued. Feeling his age. Deliberating some more, h berated himself: Milksop. A pile of blankets turns you to jelly? Probably nothing.

He resumed his descent, zigging and zagging toward the shape, extending his free ar horizontally in an attempt to maintain balance. Stopping every few seconds to aim th flashlight. Radar-eyed. Ears attuned to alien sounds. Prepared at any moment to drop th light and pull the M-1 into firing position. But nothing moved; the silence remaine unblemished. Just him and the shape. The foreign shape.

As he lowered himself farther, the ground dipped abruptly. He stumbled, fought fo equilibrium, dug his heels in, and remained upright. Good. Very good for an old man. Activ metabolism . . .

He was almost there now, just a few feet away. Stop. Check the area for other foreign shapes. The hint of movement. Nothing. Wait. Go on. Take a good look. Avoid that mound o dung. Step around the panicky scatter of glossy black beetles. Tiny black legs scamperin over clots of dung. Onto something pale. Something extending from the sheeting. Pa lozenges.

He was standing over the shape now. Kneeling. Chest tautened by breath withheld. Tiltin his light downward, he saw them, soft and speckled like small white cucumbers: huma fingers. The soft pad of palm. Speckled. Night-black. Edged with crimson. An outstretche hand. Beseeking.

Pinching a corner of the blanket between his fingers, he began peeling it back with the foreboding and compulsion of a child turning over a rock, knowing all the while that slim things lived on the underside.

There. Done. He let go of the fabric and stared at what he'd exposed.

Lock-jawed, he moaned involuntarily. He was—had been—a soldier, had seen his share of abominations. But this was different. Clinical. So terribly reminiscent of something else . . .

Averting his eyes, he felt them swing back again and lock on to the contents of the blankets, imbibing the horror. Suddenly he was reeling, swaying, bobbing helplessly in a sea of images. Memories. Other hands, other nightmares. Hands. The same pose of supplication. Thousands of hands, a mountain of hands. Begging for mercy that never came.

Rising unsteadily, he took hold of an olive limb and exhaled in fierce, hot gusts. Sickened to the core, yet not unaware of the irony of the moment.

For what lay within the sheets had demolished the demons, freeing him for the first time in more than forty years.

He felt his viscera begin to churn. The iron hand letting go. A burning tide of bile rose uncontrollably in his gullet. Retching and heaving, he vomited repeatedly in the dirt, one part of him curiously detached, as if he were observing his own defilement. Careful to direct the spray away from the blankets. Not wishing to worsen what had already been done.

When he'd emptied himself he looked down again with a child's magical hope. Believing for an instant, that his emesis had served as a ritual, a sacrificial atonement that had somehow caused the horror to vanish.

But the only thing that had vanished was his hunger.

The Ford Escort ran the red light at the intersection fronting the mouth of Liberty Bell Park. Turning left on King David, it hooked onto Shlomo Hamelekh as far as Zahal Square, then sped northeast on Sultan Suleiman Road, hugging the perimeter of the Old City.

The promise of daybreak had been newly fulfilled by a fiery desert sun that rose steadily over the Mount of Olives, warming the morning, tossing splashes of copper and gold across the ashen city walls with the abandon of a painter gone mad.

The Escort rushed through brightening cobbled streets, past sidewalks and alleys dotted with early risers: Bedouin shepherds nudging their flocks toward the northeast corner of the Old City walls in preparation for the Friday livestock market; veiled women from the nearby villages settling down with bright bolts of fabric and baskets of produce for the curbside bazaar at the entrance to the Damascus Gate; Hassidim in long black coats and white leggings, walking in pairs and trios toward the Jaffa Gate, eyes affixed to the ground, hurrying to be in place at the Western Wall for the first shaharit minyan of the day; stooped, skullcapped porters bearing massive crates on narrow backs; bakers' boys carrying rings of sesame-studded bagelach suspended from stout iron bars.

Under other circumstances the driver of the Escort would have noticed all this, and more. His feelings for the city had never dimmed and no matter how many times he experienced her sights and sounds and smells, they never ceased to enchant him. But this morning his mind was on other things.

He turned the wheel and swung up Shmuel Ben Adayah. A quick left brought him onto the Mount of Olives Road toward the peak of Mount Scopus. The highest point in the city. The Eye of Jerusalem, where the outrage had taken place.

Flares and metal barriers had been laid across the road. Behind the barriers stood a border policeman—a Druze the driver knew, by the name of Salman Afif. Afif maintained an impassive watch, legs spread and planted firmly, one hand resting on his holstered pistol, the other twirling the ends of enormous black mustaches. When the Escort approached he motioned for it to halt, came to the open window, and nodded in recognition. After a cursory exchange of greetings, the barriers were pulled aside.

As the Escort passed through, the driver surveyed the hilltop, examining the vehicles parked along the road: the mobile crime van; the transport van from the Abu Kabir pathology lab; a blue-and-white, its blue blinker still flashing; Afif's jeep; a white Volvo 240 with police plates. The technicians had already arrived, as had uniformed officers—but only two of them. Next to the Volvo stood Deputy Commander Laufer and his driver. But no police spokesmen.

no press, no sign of the pathologist. Wondering about it, the driver parked at some distance from the others, turned off the engine, and set the hand brake. There was a note pad on the passenger seat. He grasped it somewhat clumsily in his left hand and got out of the car.

He was a small, dark, neat-looking man, five foot seven, one hundred and forty pounds, thirty-seven years old but appearing ten years younger. He wore simple clothes—short-sleeved white cotton shirt, dark trousers, sandals without socks—and no jewelry except for an inexpensive wristwatch and an incongruously ornate wedding band of gold filigree.

His hair was thick, black, and tightly kinked, trimmed to medium length in the style the Americans called Afro, and topped with a small black kipah srugah—knitted yarmulke—bordered with red roses. The face below the Afro was lean and smooth, skin the color of coffee liberally laced with cream, stretched tightly over a clearly delineated substructure of high, sharp cheekbones, strong nose anchored by flared nostrils, wide lips, full and bowed. Only the upper surface of his left hand was a different color—grayish-white, puckered and shiny, crisscrossed with scars.

Arched eyebrows created the illusion of perpetual surprise. Deep sockets housed a pair of liquid, almond eyes, the irises a strange shade of golden-brown, the lashes so long they bordered on the womanish. In another context he could have been taken for someone of Latin or Caribbean descent, or perhaps Iberian melded with a robust infusion of Aztec. On at least one occasion he had been mistaken for a light-skinned black man.

His name was Daniel Shalom Sharavi and he was, in fact, a Jew of Yemenite origins. Timely circumstance, and protekzia—fortuitous connections—had made him a policeman. Intelligence and industriousness had raised him to the rank of pakad—chief inspector—in the National Police, Southern District. For most of his career, he'd been a detective. For the last two years he'd specialized in Major Crimes, which, in Jerusalem, rarely referred to the kind of thing that had brought him to Scopus this morning.

He walked toward the activity. The transport attendants sat in their van. The uniformed policemen were talking to an older man in a Civil Guard uniform. Daniel gave him a second look: late sixties to early seventies, thin but powerfully built, with close-cropped white hair and a bristly white mustache. He seemed to be lecturing the policemen, pointing toward a gully off the west side of the road, gesticulating with his hands, moving his lips rapidly.

Laufer stood several yards away, seemingly oblivious to the lecture, smoking and checking his watch. The deputy commander wore a black knit shirt and gray slacks, as if he'd lacked the time to don his uniform. In civilian clothes, bereft of ribbons, he looked pudgier, definitely less impressive. When he saw Daniel approaching, he dropped his cigarette and ground it out in the dirt, then said something to the driver, who walked away. Not waiting for Daniel to reach him, he moved forward, paunch first, in short, brisk steps.

They met midway and shared a minimal handshake.

“Horrible,” said Laufer. “Butchery.” When he spoke his jowls quivered like empty water bladders. His eyes, Daniel noticed, looked more tired than usual.

Laufer's hand fumbled in his shirt pocket and drew out a pack of cigarettes. English Oval Souvenirs from the latest London trip, no doubt. He lit a cigarette and blew the smoke out of his nose in twin drafts.

“Butchery,” he said again.

Daniel cocked his head toward the Hagah man.

“He the one who found it?”

Laufer nodded. “Schlesinger, Yaakov.”

“This part of his regular patrol?”

“Yes. From Old Hadassah, around the university, down past the Amelia Catherine, and back. Back and forth, five times a night, six nights a week.”

“A lot of walking for someone his age.”

“He’s a tough one. Former palmahi. Claims he doesn’t need much sleep.”

“How many times had he been through when he discovered it?”

“Four. This was the last pass. Back up the road and then he picks up his car on Sderot Churchill and drives home. To French Hill.”

“Does he log?”

“At the end, in the car. Unless he finds something out of the ordinary.” Laufer smiled bitterly.

“So we may be able to pinpoint when it was dumped.”

“Depending on how seriously you take him.”

“Any reason not to?”

“At his age?” said Laufer. “He says he’s certain it wasn’t there before, but who knows? He may be trying to avoid looking sloppy.”

Daniel looked at the old man. He’d stopped lecturing and stood ruler-straight between the policemen. Wearing the M-1 as if it were part of him. Uniform pressed and creased. The old guard type. Nothing sloppy about him.

Turning back to Laufer, he lifted his note pad with his bad hand, flipped it open, and pulled out his pen.

“What time does he say he found it?” he asked.

“Five forty-five.”

A full hour before he’d been called. He lowered the pen, looked at Laufer questioningly.

“I wanted things quiet,” said the deputy commander matter-of-factly. Without apology. “At least until we can put this in context. No press, no statements, a minimum of personnel. And no needless chatter with any personnel not on the investigating team.”

“I see,” said Daniel. “Dr. Levi’s been here?”

“Been and gone. He’ll do the necropsy this afternoon and call you.”

The deputy commander took a deep drag on his cigarette, got a shred of tobacco on his lip and spat it out.

“Do you think he’s back?” he asked. “Our gray friend?”

It was a premature question, thought Daniel. Even for one who had made his mark in the administration.

“Does the evidence fit?” he asked.

Laufer’s expression made light of the question. “The site fits, doesn’t it? Weren’t the others found right around here?”

“One of them—Marcovici. Farther down. In the woodlands.”

“And the others?”

“Two in Sheikh Jarrah, the fourth—”

“Exactly.” Laufer cut him off. “All within a half-kilometer radius. Perhaps the bastard has something for this area. Something psychological.”

“Perhaps,” said Daniel. “What about the wounds?”

“Go down there and look for yourself,” said the deputy commander.

He turned away, smoking and coughing. Daniel left him and climbed nimbly down into the gully. Two technicians, one male, one female, were working near the body, which was covered by a white sheet.

“Good morning, Pakad Sharavi,” the man said with mock deference. He held a test tube up to the sunlight, shook it gently, and placed it in an open evidence case.

“Steinfeld,” acknowledged Daniel. He ran his eyes over the site. Searching for revelation, seeing only the gray of stone, the dun of soil. Torsos of olive trees twisting through the dust, their tops shimmering silver-green. A kilometer of sloping rocky field; beyond it the deep, narrow valley of Wadi el Joz. Sheikh Jarrah, with its jumble of alleys and vanilla-colored houses. Flashes of turquoise: wrought-iron grills painted in the hue the Arabs believed would repel evil spirits. The towers and steeples of the American colony meshing with tangles of television antennas.

No blood spatter, no trail of crushed foliage, no bits of clothing adhering conveniently to jutting tree limbs. No geographical confession. Just a white form lying under a tree. Isolated, ovoid, out of place. Like an egg dropped out of the sky by some giant, careless bird.

“Did Dr. Levi have anything to say after his examination?” he asked.

“Clucked his tongue a lot.” Steinfeld picked up another test tube, examined it, put it down.

Daniel noticed several plaster casts in the case and asked, “Any clear footprints?”

“Just those of the Hagah man,” the technician said disgustedly. “If there were others, he obliterated them. He also threw up. Over there.” He pointed to a dry, whitening patch a meter to the left of the sheet. “Missed the body. Good aim, eh?”

The woman was a new hire named Avital. She knelt in the dirt, taking samples of leaves, twigs, and dung, scooping them into plastic bags, working quickly and silently with an intense expression on her face. When she’d sealed the bags she looked up and grimaced. “You don’t want to look at this one, adoni.”

“How true,” said Daniel. He got down on his knees and lifted up the sheet.

The face had been left intact. It lay tilted in an unnatural position, staring up at him with half-closed, clouded eyes. Horribly pretty, like a doll’s head fastened to the carnage below. A young face, dusky, roundish, lightly sprinkled with pimples on forehead and chin, wavy black hair, long and shining.

How old could she have been? he thought. Fifteen, maybe sixteen? A hot anger kindled in his abdomen. Avital was staring at him and he realized he was clenching his fists. Quickly he relaxed them, felt the fingertips tingle.

“Was the hair like this when you found it?” he asked.

“Like what?” asked Steinfeld.

“Clean. Combed.”

The technicians looked at each other.

“Yes,” said Avital.

Steinfeld nodded and paused expectantly, as if waiting for another question. When none came he shrugged and went back to work.

Daniel leaned in closer and sniffed. The stench of death had begun to issue from the corpse but through it he made out the clean, sweet scent of soap. Someone had washed her.

He raised his head and continued examining the face. The mouth hung slightly agape revealing a hint of white but widely spaced teeth. The lower ones were crowded and chipped. An upper canine was missing. Not a rich girl. Pierced ears but no earrings. No tribal tattoos, scars, birthmarks, or blemishes.

“Any identification?”

“Life should be so easy,” said Steinfeld.

Daniel stared a bit longer, then ceased his inspection of individual features. Shifting his perspective, he regarded the face as an entity and searched for ethnic characteristics. She appeared Oriental, but that meant little. It was a rare Jerusalem face that told a definite ethnic story—Arab, Ashkenazi, Druze, Bukharan, Armenian. Each had its prototype, but the overlap was substantial. He’d seen too many blond, blue-eyed Arabs, too many swarthy Germans to be confident about racial guesses. Still, it would have been nice to find something, somewhere to start . . .

A shiny green fly settled on the lower lip and began exploring. He shoed it away. Forced his eyes downward.

The throat had been cut deeply from ear to ear, severing gullet and trachea, separating the ivory knobs of the spinal cord, millimeters from complete decapitation. Each small breach was circled by stab wounds. The abdomen had been sliced open under the ribs on the right side, swooping down to the pelvis and back up to the left. Glossy bits of tissue peeked out from under the flap of the wound. The pubic region was an unrecognizable mass of gore.

The fire in his belly intensified. He covered the body from the neck down.

“She wasn’t killed here,” he said.

Steinfeld shook his head in agreement. “Not enough blood for that. Almost no blood at all in fact. Looks as if she’s been drained.”

“What do you mean?”

Steinfeld pointed to the wound flap. “No blood on the body. What’s visible under the wound looks pale—like a lab specimen. Drained.”

“What about semen?”

“Nothing conspicuous—we took scrapings. Levi’s internal will tell you more.”

Daniel thought of the destruction that had been visited upon the genitals. “Do you think Dr. Levi will be able to get anything from the vaginal vault?”

“You’ll have to ask Dr. Levi.” Steinfeld snapped the evidence case shut.

“Someone cleaned her up thoroughly,” said Daniel, more to himself than to the techs.

“I suppose.”

There was a camera next to the case.

“You’ve taken your pictures?”

“All the usual ones.”

“Take some extra ones. Just in case.”

“We’ve already shot three rolls,” said Steinfeld.

“Shoot more,” said Daniel. “Let’s not have a repeat of the Aboutboul disaster.”

“I had nothing to do with Aboutboul,” said Steinfeld, defensively. But the look on his face bespoke more than defensiveness.

He's horrified, thought Daniel, and fighting to hide it. He softened his tone.

"I know that, Meir."

"Some defective from Northern District on loan to the National Staff," the technician continued to complain. "Takes the camera and opens it in a lighted room—bye-bye evidence."

Daniel's mind longed to be somewhere else, but he shook his head knowingly, forcing himself to commiserate.

"Protekzia?"

"What else? Someone's nephew."

"Figures."

Steinfeld inspected the contents of his case, closed it, and wiped his hands on his pants. He glanced toward the camera, picked it up.

"How many extra rolls do you want?"

"Take two more, okay?"

"Okay."

Daniel wrote in his note pad, rose, brushed off his trousers, and looked again at the dead girl. The static beauty of the face, the defilement . . . Young one, what were your final thoughts, your agonies . . . ?

"Any sand on the body?" he asked.

"Nothing," said Avital, "not even between the toes."

"What about the hair?"

"No," she said. "I combed through it. Before that, it looked perfect—shampooed and set." Pause. "Why would that be?"

"A hair fetishist," said Steinfeld. "A freak. When you deal with freaks, anything's possible. Isn't that right, Pakad?"

"Absolutely." Daniel said good-bye and climbed back up. Laufer was back in his Volvo talking on the radio. His driver stood behind the barrier, chatting with Afif. The old Hagan man was still sandwiched between the two officers. Daniel caught his eye and he nodded formally, as if in salute. Daniel began walking toward him but was stopped by the deputy commander's voice.

"Sharavi."

He turned around. Laufer had gotten out of the car and was waving him over.

"So?" the deputy commander demanded when they were face to face.

"As you said, butchery."

"Does it look like the bastard's work?"

"Not on the surface."

"Be specific," ordered Laufer.

"This one's a child. The Gray Man's victims were older—mid- to late thirties."

The deputy commander dismissed the point with a wave.

"Perhaps he's changed his taste," he said. "Acquired a lust for young whores."

"We don't know this one's a whore," said Daniel, surprised at the edge in his voice.

Laufer grunted, looked away.

"The wounds differ as well," said Daniel. "The Gray Man made his incision laterally, on the left side of the throat. He severed the major blood vessels but didn't cut nearly as deeply as this one—which makes sense, because the Gadish woman, the one who'd survived long enough to talk, described his knife as a small one. This poor girl was just about decapitated which suggests a larger, heavier weapon.”

“Which would be the case if he’s gotten angrier and better-armed,” said Laufer. “Progressively more violent. It’s a pattern with sex fiends, isn’t it?”

“Sometimes,” said Daniel. “But the discrepancies go beyond intensity. The Gray Man concentrated on the upper trunk. Struck at the breasts, but never below the waist. And he killed his victims on the spot, after they began to fellate him. This one was murdered elsewhere. Someone washed her hair and combed it out. Scrubbed her clean.”

Laufer perked up. “What does that mean?”

“I don’t know.”

The deputy commander grabbed another Oval, jammed it in his mouth, lit it, and puffed furiously.

“Another one,” he said. “Another mad bastard prowling our streets.”

“There are other possibilities,” said Daniel.

“What, another Tutunji?”

“It needs to be considered.”

“Shit.”

Faiz Tutunji. Daniel uttered the name to himself and conjured the face that went with it: long, sunken-cheeked, snaggle-toothed, the same lazy eyes in every arrest photo. A petty thief from Hebron, with a talent for getting caught. Definitely small-time until a trip to Amman had turned him into a revolutionary. He’d come back spouting slogans, assembled six cohorts and kidnapped a female soldier off a side street not far from the Haifa harbor. Gang-raped her in the Carmel mountains, then strangled her and cut her up to make it look like a sex murder. A Northern District patrol had caught up with them just outside of Acre, trying to force another hayelet into their van at gunpoint. The ensuing shootout had eliminated six of seven gang members, including Tutunji, and the survivor had produced written orders from Fatah Central Command. Blessings from Chairman Arafat for an honorable new strategy against the Zionist interloper.

“Liberation through mutilation,” spat Laufer. “Just what we need.” He grimaced in contemplation, then said, “Okay. I’ll make the appropriate inquiries, find out if any new rumblings have been picked up. If it turns into a security case you’ll liaison with Latam, Shin Bet, and Mossad.” He began walking up the road, toward the still-quiet southern border of the old Hebrew University campus. Daniel stayed by his side.

“What else?” said the deputy commander. “You said possibilities.”

“Blood revenge. Love gone wrong.”

Laufer digested that.

“A little brutal for that, don’t you think?”

“When passion plays a role, things can get out of hand,” said Daniel, “but yes, I think it’s only a remote possibility.”

“Blood revenge,” Laufer reflected. “She look like an Arab to you?”

“No way to tell.”

Laufer looked displeased, as if Daniel possessed some special insight into what Arab women looked like and had chosen to withhold it.

“Our first priority,” said Daniel, “should be to identify her, then work backward from there. The sooner we assemble the team, the better.”

“Fine, fine. Ben-Ari’s available, as is Zussman. Which do you want?”

“Neither. I’ll take Nahum Shmeltzer.”

“I thought he retired.”

“Not yet—next spring.”

“None too soon. He’s a dray horse, burned out. Lacks creativity.”

“He’s creative in his own way,” said Daniel. “Bright and tenacious—well suited for record work. There’ll be plenty of that on this case.”

Laufer blew smoke at the sky, cleared his throat, said finally, “Very well, take him. In terms of your subinspector—”

“I want Yosef Lee.”

“Free egg rolls, eh?”

“He’s a good team worker. Knows the streets, indefatigable.”

“How much homicide experience?”

“He put in time on the old woman from Musrara—the one asphyxiated by the burglar gag. And he came onto Gray Man shortly before we . . . reduced our activity. Along with Daoud, whom I also want.”

“The Arab from Bethlehem?”

“The same.”

“That,” said Laufer, “could prove awkward.”

“I’m aware of that. But the benefits exceed the drawbacks.”

“Name them.”

Daniel did and the deputy commander listened with a bland expression on his face. After several moments of deliberation he said, “You want an Arab, okay, but you’ll have to run a tight ship. If it turns into a security case he’ll be transferred out immediately—for his own good, as well as ours. And it will go down on your record as an administrative blunder.”

Daniel ignored the threat, put forth his next request. “Something this big, I could use more than one samal. There’s a kid over at the Russian Compound named Ben Aharon—”

“Forget it on both counts,” said Laufer. He turned on his heel, began walking back to the Volvo, forcing Daniel to follow in order to hear what he was saying. “Business as usual—on samal—and I’ve already chosen him. New hire named Avi Cohen, just transferred from Tel Aviv.”

“What talent does he have to pull a transfer so soon?”

“Young, strong, eager, earned a ribbon in Lebanon.” Laufer paused. “He’s the third son of Pinni Cohen, the Labor MK from Petah Tikva.”

“Didn’t Cohen just die?”

“Two months ago. Heart attack, all the stress. In case you don’t read the papers, he was one of our friends in Knesset, a sweetheart during budget struggles. Kid’s got a good record and we’d be doing the widow a favor.”

“Why the transfer?”

“Personal reasons.”

“How personal?”

“Nothing to do with his work. He had an affair with the wife of a superior. Asher Davidoff, blonde, a first-class kurva.”

“It indicates,” said Daniel, “a distinct lack of good judgment.”

The deputy commander waved away his objection.

“It’s an old story with her, Sharavi. She goes for the young ones, makes a blatant play for them. No reason for Cohen to eat it because he got caught. Give him a chance.”

His tone indicated that further debate was unwelcome, and Daniel decided the issue wasn’t worth pressing. He’d gotten nearly everything he wanted. There’d be plenty of quiet work for this Cohen. Enough to keep him busy and out of trouble.

“Fine,” he said, suddenly impatient with talk. Looking over his shoulder at the Hagah man, he began mentally framing his interview questions, the best way to approach an old soldier.

“. . . absolutely no contact with the press,” Laufer was saying, “I’ll let you know if and when a leak is called for. You’ll report directly to me. Keep me one hundred percent informed.”

“Certainly. Anything else?”

“Nothing else,” said Laufer. “Just clear this one up.”

After the deputy commander had been driven away, Daniel walked over to Schlesinger. He told the uniformed officers to wait by their car and extended his hand to the Hagah man. The one that gripped it in return was hard and dry.

“Adon Schlesinger, I’m Pakad Sharavi. I’d like to ask you a few questions.”

“Sharavi?” The man’s voice was deep, hoarse, his Hebrew clipped short by the vestiges of a German accent. “You’re a Yemenite?”

Daniel nodded.

“I knew a Sharavi once,” said Schlesinger. “Skinny little fellow—Moshe the baker. Lived in the Old City before we lost it in ’48, left to join the crew that built the cable trolley from the Ophthalmic Hospital to Mount Zion.” He pointed south. “We put it up every night and dismantled it before sunrise. So the goddamned British wouldn’t catch us sending food and medicine to our fighters.”

“My uncle,” said Daniel.

“Ach, small world. How’s he doing?”

“He died five years ago.”

“What from?”

“Stroke.”

“How old was he, seventy?” Schlesinger’s face had drawn tight with anxiety, the bushy white eyebrows drooping low over watery blue eyes.

“Seventy-nine.”

“Seventy-nine,” echoed Schlesinger. “Could be worse. He was a hell of a worker for a little guy, never griped. You come from good stock, Pakad Sharavi.”

“Thank you.” Daniel pulled out his note pad. Schlesinger’s eyes followed him, stopped focused on the back of his hand. Stared at the scar tissue. An observant one, thought Daniel.

“Tell me about your patrol,” he said.

Schlesinger shrugged. “What’s there to tell? I walk up and down the road five times a night, scaring away jackrabbits.”

“How long have you been with Hagah?”

“Fourteen years, first spring out of the reserves. Patrolled Rehavya for thirteen of them, past the Prime Minister’s house. A year ago I bought a flat in the towers on French Hill—near your headquarters—and the wife insisted I take something closer to home.”

“What’s your schedule?”

“Midnight to sunrise, Monday through Saturday. Five passes from Old Hadassah to the Be sample content of The Butcher's Theater (Jonathan Kellerman)

- download online The Everything Guide to Wine online
- download Argentina \(Insight Guides\)
- How We Think: A Theory of Goal-Oriented Decision Making and its Educational Applications \(Studies in Mathematical Thinking and Learning\) pdf, azw \(kindle\)
- download Discover Hawaii the Big Island \(Full Color Regional Travel Guide\)

- <http://aneventshop.com/ebooks/The-Everything-Guide-to-Wine.pdf>
- <http://www.khoi.dk/?books/Argentina--Insight-Guides-.pdf>
- <http://tuscalaural.com/library/How-We-Think--A-Theory-of-Goal-Oriented-Decision-Making-and-its-Educational-Applications--Studies-in-Mathematic>
- <http://aneventshop.com/ebooks/Discover-Hawaii-the-Big-Island--Full-Color-Regional-Travel-Guide-.pdf>