THE Peony Pavilion

Mudan ting, Second Edition

TRANSLATED WITH A NEW PREFACE BY

Cyril Birch

Catherine Swatek

Table of Contents

Title Page
Copyright Page
Dedication
Preface to the Second Edition
Introduction
A Note on Layout
SCENE ONE: Legend
SCENE TWO: Declaring Ambition
SCENE THREE: Admonishing the Daughter
SCENE FOUR: Pedant's Lament
SCENE FIVE: Engaging the Tutor - Enter DU BAO with attendants and underlings
SCENE SIX: Despairing Hopes
SCENE SEVEN: The Schoolroom
SCENE EIGHT: Speed the Plough - Enter PREFECT DU with PAGE BOY, underlings, and attendant
SCENE NINE : Sweeping the Garden
SCENE TEN: The Interrupted Dream
SCENE ELEVEN: Well-meant Warning
SCENE TWELVE: Pursuing the Dream
SCENE THIRTEEN: In Search of Patronage
SCENE FOURTEEN: The Portrait
SCENE FIFTEEN: A Spy for the Tartars
SCENE SIXTEEN: The Invalid
SCENE SEVENTEEN: Sorceress of the Tao
SCENE EIGHTEEN: Diagnoses
SCENE NINETEEN: The Brigandess
SCENE TWENTY: Keening
SCENE TWENTY-ONE: The Interview
SCENE TWENTY-TWO: Traveler's Rest
SCENE TWENTY-THREE: Infernal judgment
SCENE TWENTY-FOUR: The Portrait Recovered
SCENE TWENTY-FIVE: Maternal Remembrance
SCENE TWENTY-SIX: The Portrait Examined
SCENE TWENTY-SEVEN: Spirit Roaming
SCENE TWENTY-EIGHT: Union in the Shades
SCENE TWENTY-NINE: Gossip
SCENE THIRTY: Disrupted Joy
SCENE THIRTY-ONE: Defensive Works
SCENE THIRTY-TWO: Spectral Vows
SCENE THIRTY-THREE: Confidential Plans
SCENE THIRTY-FOUR: Consultation
SCENE THIRTY-FIVE: Resurrection

SCENE THIRTY-SIX: Elopement

SCENE THIRTY-EIGHT: The Scourge of the Huai SCENE THIRTY-NINE: Hangzhou SCENE FORTY: In Search of the Master SCENE FORTY-ONE: Delayed Examination SCENE FORTY-TWO: Troop Transfer SCENE FORTY-THREE: The Siege of Huaian SCENE FORTY-FOUR: Concern for the Besieged SCENE FORTY-FIVE: A Spy for the Rebels SCENE FORTY-SIX: The Rebels Countered SCENE FORTY-SEVEN: Raising the Siege SCENE FORTY-EIGHT: Mother and Daughter Reunited SCENE FORTY-NINE: Moored before Huaian SCENE FIFTY: Uproar at the Banquet SCENE FIFTY-ONE: The Lists Proclaimed SCENE FIFTY-TWO: The Search for the Candidate SCENE FIFTY-THREE: Interrogation under the Rod SCENE FIFTY-FOUR: Glad News SCENE FIFTY-FIVE: Reunion at Court

SCENE THIRTY-SEVEN: The Alarm

Index of Aria Patterns

Peony Pavilion

Mudan ting, Second Edition

Tang Xianzu

Translated with a new preface by Cyril Birch

Introduction to the second edition by Catherine Swatek

Bloomington and Indianapolis

Indiana University Press 601 North Morton Street Bloomington, IN 47404-3797 USA

http://iupress.indiana.edu

Telephone orders 800-842-6796 Fax orders 812-855-7931 E-mail orders iuporder@indiana.edu

First edition 1980, Indiana University Press © 2002 by Indiana University Press All rights reserved

No part of this book may be reproduced or utilized in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopyin and recording, or by any information storage and retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publisher. The Association of American University Presses' Resolution on Permissions constitutes the only exception to this prohibition.

The paper used in this publication meets the minimum requirements of American National Standard for Information Sciences—Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, ANSI Z39.48-1984.

Manufactured in the United States of America

Cataloging-in-Publication data is available from the Library of Congress. ISBN 0-253-34097-7 ISBN 0-253-21527-7 (pbk.)

1 2 3 4 5 07 06 05 04 03 02

Preface to the Second Edition

Has the world ever seen a woman's love to rival that of Bridal Du?

Dreaming of a lover she fell sick; once sick she became ever worse; and finally, after painting her own portrait as a legacy to the world, she died. Dead for three years, still she was able to live again when in the dark underworld her quest for the object of her dream was fulfilled. To be as Bridal Du is truly to have known love.

Love is of source unknown, yet it grows ever deeper. The living may die of it, by its power th dead live again. Love is not love at its fullest if one who lives is unwilling to die for it, or if it cannot restore to life one who has so died. And must the love that comes in dream necessarily be unreal? For there is no lack of dream lovers in this world. Only for those whose love must be fulfilled on the pillow and for whom affection deepens only after retirement from office, is it entirely a corporeal matter....

Tang Xianzu wrote these words in 1598, in his own preface to his new play. He was forty-eight years old, scion of a gentry family of Linchuan in Jiangxi. In his twenties he had made a name of himself as scholar and poet, and at thirty-three he passed the Advanced Scholar (jinshi) examination gateway to the highest levels of the imperial bureaucracy. His reward was appointment in the prestigious Ministry of Rites in the "southern capital," Nanjing. Before long, however, he conceived his duty as a loyal subject to protest against attempts by the Grand Secretary of the day to block the "path of speech," the means by which honest advisers might gain the ear of the emperor. His majes viewed Tang's memorial as a reflection on his own judgment, and responded not by action against the Grand Secretary but by reducing the memorialist to service as a jail warden in a remote corner Guangdong.

The bureaucracy's loss was literature's gain. Tang never again reached higher rank than distrimagistrate, and in 1597 he retired to his family home to devote himself to his writing. The People Pavilion was his third play and his masterpiece. It rapidly won wide popularity, and Tang personal instructed actors in its performance. Before his death in 1616 he completed two more major "dream plays, The Handan Tale (Handanji) and Tale of the Southern Bough (Nankeji), both based on o Daoist parables, both plays continuing Tang's search to reconcile, in the realm of human feeling, the claims of Confucian ideals with the transcendental values of Daoism and Buddhism which the playwright had imbibed from family members, notably his grandmother, and from friends amon learned monks and recluses.

Peony Pavilion is Tang's longest play, his most protracted and profound meditation on the nature of love. One of the preoccupations of late-Ming thinkers was the place of what they called qing in the scheme of values. Qing is the word I translate as "love" in the above quotation from Tang's preface. more extended equivalent would be "feeling": joy and sorrow, fear and anger, desire and hate are a part of the feeling side of the dichotomy qing versus li, qing standing for the spontaneous affects the heart and li for the powers of reason and the conventions of the coldly rational. For Tang Xianz qing in its highest development, as true love between man and woman, embraces sexual attraction physical passion, but also sentiment, empathy, devotion—the virtues of that broader love that exist also outside the sexual relationship.

Tang found the vehicle he needed in an old tale, a run-of-the-mill story of the so-calle "promptbook" genre. "Bridal Du Longing for Love Returns in Spirit Form" (Du Liniang mu se huc hun) baldly tells of a girl who dreams of a lover, pines for him and dies, but is permitted to return from the shades to the world of light. By the power of his poetic genius Tang Xianzu creates from the crude tale a model of the ultimate mystery of Woman. Bridal Du is unforgettable as a young girl in the early scenes, cloistered and shy, yearning for love yet hiding her feelings even from the pert ma Spring Fragrance, her confidante. She flowers through love's experience, first in dream only, then as shade in the nether realm; more and more openly sensuous, gaining in courage and self-possession she emerges full-fledged at last as wife and helpmeet. Bridal's archetypal quality is strengthened to many allusions to earlier heroines: to ladies in portraits who came to life and stepped forward frow the painted silk, and to Qiannü, in the poignant fourteenth-century play, who lay comatose in he chamber while her disembodied spirit valiantly pursued her lover to the capital.

Bridal's dream lover, the young scholar Liu Mengmei, undergoes stern tests to prove himself a may of true feeling. He has more to conquer than Bridal's heart and maidenhood. He must overcome he fear when he discovers his beloved is a ghost. Then, further even than this, he must banish a revulsion over the disinterment of her corpse, and hold to his faith in the power of his love to resurre her incorrupt physical body—just as Bridal, in her turn, must hold fast to her love for him in the chof the grave and through the shadows of her spectral wanderings.

The realms of dreams and ghosts and demons provide avenues to psychological truth as philosophical depth in Peony Pavilion, but we can rest assured that they held a solid reality for Tar Xianzu and the audience of his day. And indeed of a later time: We have a real-life account of parallel situation to Liu Mengmei's in a moving passage from the eighteenth-century memoirs Shen Fu, Six Chapters from a Floating Life. After the death of his beloved wife Yuen, Shen Fu keeps lone vigil in her chamber in the fearful hope of a visit from her spirit:

Opening my eyes, I looked into all four corners of my room. I saw the two candles burning brightly on the table, but even as I looked at them, their flames began shrinking slowly until the were no larger than beans.

I was horror-struck. My hair stood on end and my whole body was seized with an icy shiver. To stop my trembling, I rubbed my hands together and wiped my forehead, staring steadily at the candles all the time. Suddenly, both candle flames commenced to rise until they were more than foot high and in danger of setting fire to the paper ceiling, and the light had become so bright the whole room was lit up. Then, just as suddenly, the flames began shrinking and growing dimmer, until they were just as tiny as before.

By this time my heart was pounding and my legs were trembling. I wanted to call Chang to come in and look, but remembering Yuen's gentle spirit and retiring nature, I changed my mind afraid that the presence in the room of a living stranger might distress her. Instead, I began calling her name and implored her to appear to me. But nothing happened. I remained alone in the silence and dimness. Finally the candle flames became bright again, but did not rise high as before. Then I went out and told Chang what I had seen. He thought me very strong and fearless not knowing that mine was only the strength and bravery of love.

(Translation by Shirley M. Black)

Where Liu Mengmei is the very incarnation of masculine qing, Bridal's father Du Bao represent the opposite term of the dichotomy, Confucian rationality or li. Liu Mengmei never flinches who asked to disinter Bridal's body; Du Bao in contrast refuses until the last possible moment acknowledge her living reality. Du Bao is a Chinese father, and thus even in a stage comedy (mo precisely a tragicomedy), he commands respect. Substitute for him the sort of gullible old pantalog who would be the girl's father in Roman comedy or in the plays of Molière, and we would lose the whole point of the play. Du Bao is a decent man, fondly appreciative of his young daughter and filled with tender sorrow by the (falsely reported) death of his wife. The set piece of scene 8 shows he paternal concern for the rustic populace in his charge as Prefect. He is admirable, later, in he determination to defend besieged Huaian, though held down to less than heroic proportions by the rather cheap trick he employs against the rebel Li Quan and his dame. Above all, Du Bao is the blinkered Confucian rationalist. His daughter, too young in his eyes to be prey to the unworth emotion of passion, died three years ago and was buried, and there's an end on't. Her resurrected second only be some malevolent harpy; Liu Mengmei can be nothing more than an impostor and a grant robber; nothing will induce this father to acknowledge them—until, in the great climactic moment the final scene, Bridal swoons away and Du Bao, overcome at last by spontaneous affection—by qin—exclaims, "My daughter!"

This story of Bridal Du, crudely fantastic in the original tale, grows glamorous under Tang Xianzu lyrical brush. But both fantasy and glamour are undercut by a rich, earthy comedy that establishes the play on a satisfyingly sturdy foundation. With a character such as Scabby Turtle present at Bridal exhumation, we have no choice but to suspend our disbelief. The mysteries of love can never clewhen they are constantly being shot through, by the cheeky flower-lad who propositions Spring Fragrance in scene 9, by Sister Stone's bawdy autobiography in scene 17, or by the extraordina amatory history narrated by the infernal Judge in scene 23 through the medium of puns on the nam of thirty-eight different flowers.

The scope of Peony Pavilion is vast. Not surprisingly, the large cast included several staple figur of Ming comedy, but often these are clothed with rich invention. Tutor Chen is a bumbling old pedar picking his teeth through the spring afternoon that sets Bridal's heart aflame, but he develops in the most interesting way to stand as her eventual champion against her stiff-necked father. Spring Fragrance is the pert abigail in the tradition of Hongniang of the Story of the Western Wing; it is a picker role diminishes after the vibrancy of her early scenes. Comic relief in the later part of the plane revolves around the henpecked traitor Li Quan and his lusty dame, and the uproarious scene introduces another stock figure in the person of the ridiculous barbarian.

At a more sophisticated comic level, several of the older males in the play are instruments topical satire. Not long before Tang Xianzu was writing, peace agreements between the Ming empi and raiding Mongols under their leader Altan Khan had included the offer of a fief of land to one Altan's wives. This kind of truckling to the border tribes, which was crippling the late-Ming courts, directly satirized in Du Bao's bribery of Dame Li. In like manner, the Judge's songs of scene 2 pillory official venery, and Miao Shunbin, in scene 41, epitomizes the incompetence of chi examiners (not that the candidates themselves are spared; their essays on the burning topic of nation defense contain nothing but sexual innuendo).

long lyrical work with a cavalcade of scenes. Such plays, or rather operas, were intended for performance before an elite audience, usually in a private household, often through the leisurely day of a festival. Families of ample means might boast their own private troupe of actors, or at least has been training some of their own household servants from childhood in the demanding techniques of drama in which there is "no word but is sung, no movement but is danced," in the time-honored phrase of the schools. The actor playing the role of Bridal might be male or female, but consummate sk would be expected in the singing of the arias to the accompaniment of languorous flute or livelier pipers.

Like his three other major plays, Tang Xianzu's Peony Pavilion is a dramatic romance or chuanqi,

As is true of the most refined schools of classical Chinese opera to the present day, the tradition chuanqi performances dispensed with anything in the way of a set beyond perhaps a table and a coup of chairs. The total number of scenes could be very large (Peony Pavilion with fifty-five does not hothe record for length), and the variety of individual scenes ranged from short transitional with one two characters, through comic or martial or major dramatic episodes, all the way to grand scenes with many participants such as that of final reunion in Peony Pavilion scene 55. Successive settings for the action might therefore shift from boudoir or study to roadside inn or prison cell, city wall, mountated top or sea bottom, imperial court or courtroom in hell. Dialogue and arias will make it quite clearly where the action is taking place, and descriptions of background, landscape, and atmosphere will often be lushly poetic. It is not very usual for the venue to change within a single scene but if it does to characters will indicate this by taking a few steps, perhaps circling the stage, and then announced their arrival at the new location.

(lute), and in the miming of the poetic images with balletic grace in every movement and gesture.

Tang Xianzu furnished his original text with quite explicit stage directions, to which I have added very little beyond an occasional reminder that, for example, the "boat" in scene 36 is an imaginatione, indicated by the boatman's pole or oar and by elaborate miming as the actors "board" and a "rowed away." Two characters may be understood to be invisible to each other, even though both an in full view of the audience, until an imaginary door is opened and passed through. Bridal, already stage, "emerges" from Liu's study to greet him in scene 32, and in scene 50 Liu is on stage acro from Du Bao for some time without ever being "admitted" to see him.

Other conventions to which the reader will quickly grow accustomed include self-introductions at the sometimes irritating recapitulations of plot. Tang Xianzu is no very serious offender, though, this latter regard, especially if we bear in mind the drifting in and out, over two or three days, of the original audiences for whom he wrote. Bridal sometimes seems to be given a surfeit of opportunities to reminisce about her years in the shades—to Liu, to Sister Stone, to her mother, to Spring Fragrand—but each time brings a new aria, a new set of images, a further deepening of the tints of the marvellous portrayal.

My first encounter with Peony Pavilion was as reading material on a long flight with my family Japan. By the time we landed in Tokyo I realized I would have to do a complete translation, and the sabbatical studies I had planned would simply have to wait. When my translation was first published in 1980, I concluded my introduction by sadly dismissing any hope of ever attending a complete performance of Peony Pavilion on the modern stage: Over a span of years I had witnessed a number Kunqu performances of "The Interrupted Dream" and a handful of other scenes, but aside from the Tang Xianzu's great work had remained for me no more than a literary masterpiece. I sense a hug debt now to the dedication of Madame Hua Wenyi and other actors, and to the vision and enthusias of Peter Sellars and Tan Dun, Chen Shi-Zheng, and all who have worked to bring Tang's text back to life in the theater. It has been an unforgettable thrill to be treated to their artistry and with their help discover new depths of meaning in a work I have loved for so long and thought to have understood.

I owe a particular debt to Catherine Swatek. She has made a special study of the performan history of the play over the centuries, and has traveled across three continents in close observation its modern resuscitation. It is a pleasure and a privilege to introduce here her lively report on receproductions of the play (and on the controversies surrounding them), and she has also generous provided a guide to the valuable new scholarship that continues to enrich our understanding of Peoplevilion's depth and beauty.

Cyril Birch Berkeley July 2001

Introduction: Peony Pavilion on Stage and in the Study

CATHERINE SWATEK

Nineteen ninety-nine marked 400 years since Peony Pavilion was first performed in the home of a author, and in that year three new productions of it reached audiences inside and outside of China. March, an avant-garde interpretation by the American director Peter Sellars completed i international tour with two evening performances and a matinee in Berkeley, California. At 3½ hour this was the shortest of the new productions, concluding with the resurrection of Bridal Du, enacte using a water-filled perspex tomb that had doubled as her bed in earlier scenes of lovemaking. In Jul Chen Shi-Zheng's interpretation of the complete play—killed by cultural authorities in Shanghai they was before but revived by Lincoln Center and a French co-sponsor—finally had its world premiere New York, as part of Lincoln Center's "Festival 99." At 18 hours, this "Ming Ring" in six segment included every scene and aria, perhaps for the first time ever. Finally, in October, a "classic version (jingdianban) of the "complete" play had its first public performance in Beijing, as part of the festivities marking the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the People's Republic of China. For three evenings in succession, three pairs of actors took the lead parts, and in a pointed departure fro Chen Shi-Zheng's concept, director Guo Xiaonan and his collaborators cut arias and scenes if they for they prolonged the performance unnecessarily or detracted from its beauty.

Despite decades of benign neglect in China, it is no coincidence that Peony Pavilion attracted much attention in one year. Guo Xiaonan's production, lavishly funded by the Beijing government was clearly a response to Chen Shi-Zheng's, even though no mention was made of him in the Chine media. The silence was deafening, given that many contributors on this occasion had also written about Chen's production the year before, and given that the Shanghai Kun Opera Troupe was involved in both productions. For those in the know, there were coded references to the Lincoln Cent production in the coverage of the Beijing event. Virtually all of the critiques emphasized that Guo was a "classic" version of Peony Pavilion that preserved the beauty of Tang Xianzu's original work while staging it in a contemporary style. While rehearsing his production in Shanghai the previor year, Chen Shi-Zheng had raised hackles when he announced that he was restoring many of the "dregs" (zaopo) that are regularly cut from performances of the play in China, because these dregs at the most intelligent parts of it and because "traditional drama goes too much after beauty and cast aside many things that are essential to life." Given this manifesto, insistent references to the beauty Guo Xiaonan's production in Chinese coverage of it were clearly pointed in Chen's direction.

Chen's production was a critical response to Kun opera and its aesthetic. Sellars's was too, and n simply with its high-tech stage design, contemporary costumes, and Western-style makeup. Sella feels that opera the world over is losing its relevance and its audience, and he made plain he disenchantment with the current state of Kun opera when he decided to work exclusively with actor based outside of China and collaborate with Chinese artists who now make their homes in Nor America. Hua Wenyi, former director of the Shanghai Kun Opera Troupe, defected to the United States in 1989, and Tan Dun, a composer trained in China, now makes his home in New York. Hu told Sellars in 1992 that she could not reinvigorate her art in China, and after visiting several troup there in 1997 he agreed that Kun opera was moribund. He rehearsed his production in New York, wir funds raised from European and American backers, but held out hope that the show might eventual be performed in China and perhaps reawaken interest there in Kun opera.

That hope now seems utopian, given the controversies that erupted as Peony Pavilion became entangled in cultural politics at the highest levels. At the premiere of Sellars's show in Vienna, in Ma of 1998, the Chinese ambassador in attendance told him that his staging of the play was too sexual explicit ever to be performed in China, and this view was underscored by Liao Ben, Deputy Secretar General of the Chinese Dramatists Association, at a symposium in Berkeley the following year. In the meantime, after two dress rehearsals in June of 1998, Chen Shi-Zheng's production was condemned "feudal, pornographic and superstitious" and unfit for foreign audiences by authorities at the Bure of Culture in Shanghai. Beginning in April, there had been murmurs of disenchantment in the loc media coverage, with some reporters who had attended the open rehearsals dismissing Chen's staging as a "hodgepodge" (zahui) that combined Kun opera with stilt-walking and puppetry, disco and brea dancing (an exaggerated picture, as it happens). Chen's was an "export model" (waixiangxing) of Ku opera that in no way fairly represented Chinese classical opera. Despite these complaints, no one w prepared for the Bureau's refusal to issue visas to the actors just weeks before the world premiere New York. Guo Xiaonan's production, rehearsed in secrecy and previewed by invitation only, wa fulsomely praised in the Chinese media but little covered outside of China. Its run was the shorter concluding after performances in Beijing, Shanghai, and Hong Kong. As of 2001, only Chen Sh Zheng's resurrected production is still touring.

The attention given the international productions has demonstrated Peony Pavilion's appeal audiences on three continents, but the often heated criticism of them has also revealed how firmly Koopera is wedded to its traditions. As one who is familiar with canonical interpretations of Tang's play I have welcomed Sellars's and Chen's iconoclastic approaches to the task of staging it. Both director have taken a fresh look at Tang Xianzu's original text and treated received interpretations of the play with skepticism. I have not been surprised that their interpretations met with stiff resistance, both from Kun opera aficionados and from cultural authorities who oversee artistic production in China and will venture explanations of why this was almost inevitable. Some background about how People Pavilion has been performed during the past four centuries will be helpful.

The Tradition of Performing Peony Pavilion

Since the early 1600s, Peony Pavilion has been performed in a musical style known as kunqu (Koopera, so named for its place of origin, the town of Kunshan near modern Suzhou). It is now believe that Tang Xianzu, who was a native of Linchuan, an out-of-the-way county seat in Jiangxi Province did not write the text of Peony Pavilion for performance in the Kunshan style, but, as the popularity the play rapidly spread, adaptations of it were made for that style. By the second decade of the seventeenth century, excerpts from the play were included in anthologies that catered to lovers of Kunopera, and thenceforth the play remained preeminent in the Kunopera repertoire, its unbroke tradition of performances well documented. This tradition faltered as Beijing opera supplanted Kunopera in the nineteenth century, but Kunopera's prestige as the oldest classical style of opera stipperformed has been jealously guarded.

Kun opera is elite opera, favored by scholar-officials and wealthy merchants who enjoy performances of it in their homes and gardens. Its music is soft and melodious, anchored by the horizontal bamboo flute rather than the two-stringed fiddle featured in Beijing opera. Lyrics to the syncopated tempos of its arias are sung using melisma, a technique whereby single syllables a prolonged over several bars of music. This renders the words largely incomprehensible (unless of already knows them), but kunqu's slow tempos facilitate the use of mime and dance accompaniment, expressing the meaning of the lyrics in other ways. Kun opera combines song, dance dialogue, and, to a lesser degree, acrobatics, and for most of its history the first two elements we most prized, because of the precision and beauty of their synchronization.

When word reached Shanghai of Lincoln Center's plan to stage all fifty-five scenes of the pla skepticism about the project was widespread. Senior actors in the Shanghai Troupe doubted that or actor could master the role of Bridal Du and have the stamina to perform it, especially when the learned that Qian Yi, the troupe's new young star, had been chosen for the part. After all, since the mid-eighteenth century no more than a dozen scenes from the play have remained in the repertoire Kun opera, and these have been vehicles for actors specializing in a variety of roles. Moreover, only half dozen of these scenes have featured the "boudoir dan" actor assigned the part of Bridal Du: bo dream scenes ("The Interrupted Dream" and "Pursuing the Dream"), Bridal's death scene ("Keening"), her encounter with the underworld judge ("Infernal Judgment"), one scene of ghost wooing of Liu Mengmei ("Union in the Shades"), and the grand finale ("Reunion at Court"). Even the most loyal fans of Kun opera wondered whether foreign audiences would sit through all fifty-fir scenes.

Complete performances of Peony Pavilion have been so rare that Chen Shi-Zheng's claim to be the first ever to direct one was not easy to refute. A scholar from Fudan University, Jiang Jurong, shimself that task, and the results of his research were published in the June 1998 issue of Shangh Drama. Jiang found scattered references, mostly in poems, to performances that followed Tar Xianzu's original text, and surmised that these were likely complete ones because of the amount time involved (in one case, two days and two nights). Such references persist through the Kangxi e (1662-1722), tapering off after 1694. But Jiang's findings are based on inference, and the occasion mention of a "complete" performance very likely refers to one for which an abridged script was use as indeed has been the case for Guo's "complete" version performed in Beijing.

For most of its stage career, Peony Pavilion has been performed in the manner described by Professor Birch in his book on theater in the Ming dynasty—as highlights (zhezixi, "broken-caplays") performed either separately or in a sequence of three or four linked scenes (in the modern enemands of the make up an evening's entertainment). Most zhezixi feature beautiful arias, witty dialogue and lively (re'nao) action. In the late Ming and early Qing periods, people were familiar with the complete chuanqi plays from which zhezixi were taken, but with time the link between extract at chuanqi attenuated. By the second golden age of Chinese opera during the reign of the Qianlor emperor (1736—95), few who enjoyed performances of zhezixi had read the complete mother play and almost none of the actors who performed them were literate. Interpretations of the scenes onstage though highly embellished, had less and less to do with the original playwright's design, and more at more to do with the intentions of the artists and the requirements of the occasion at which zhezixi we performed.

Examples of the "actors' takeover" of creative control abound in the case of zhezixi from People

Pavilion. As Tang Xianzu conceived it, "The Schoolroom" (scene 7) marks a pivotal moment Bridal's evolution from cloistered daughter to sexually awakened young woman, and the scene carefully apportioned among three characters: Bridal, her maid Spring Fragrance, and the tutor Chazuiliang. The comic mischief of Spring Fragrance is counterpoint to Bridal's demurely respectf treatment of the tutor. All three characters sing, and the alternating exchanges between the two your women and the comically pedantic tutor work together to reveal Bridal's growing curiosity about the world beyond the schoolroom. In the complete play, "The Schoolroom" anticipates "The Interrupte Dream" (scene 10), in which Bridal encounters her lover for the first time in the family garden. B since the eighteenth century at least, as a zhezixi it has been a vehicle for the comedic talents of the "flower dan" actress who plays the maid and the laosheng actor who plays the tutor; Bridal is litt more than a "living prop" (huo daoju). "Speed the Plough" (scene 8) features Bridal's father Du Ba and depicts him on a visit to a village in his district where he presides over spring planting rituals. The scene is very re'nao, and as written comes close to burlesquing rituals that Tang Xianzu himse would have performed as a magistrate. It exemplifies his talent for divesting rituals of a good deal their solemnity, but humor most certainly was not a part of performances at the Manchu court, whe "Speed the Plough" was often performed for observances of the Qingming festival in the third lun month. This scene was also very popular in the area around Kunshan; handwritten copies of it often crop up in script collections kept by actors who performed at weddings and village celebration Similarly deflating uses of humor disappear from mid-Qing zhezixi for Bridal's death scene (scene) 20). One preserved in a miscellary published in the 1830s interpolates both dialogue assigned Bridal and to her mother, Madam Du, and elaborate stage instructions indicating that Bridal rises fro introduced in zhezixi, and defend them as a necessary accommodation to the changing tastes of Qirdynasty audiences. The dominance of the actor has persisted in the modern period even with the advent of academically trained scriptwriters and directors, with whom they now collaborate Descriptions of the 1999 Beijing production praised the second-stage creativity of Guo Xiaona scriptwriter Wang Renjie, and senior members of the Shanghai Troupe.⁴

Historians of Kun opera have coined the term erdu chuangzao ("second-stage creation") acknowledge actors' embellishments of chuanqi. Most are undismayed by the modification her deathbed to perform numerous kowtows over her mother's anguished protests.

The "Festival 99" Version, Directed by Chen Shi-Zheng

John Rockwell, whose idea it was to perform Peony Pavilion in a days-long format, originally thoug of staging it in a manner that "possibly harkened back to Tang's time." To him this meant faith textual completeness and in what can be revealed through "a creative reinterpretation of the past Both ideas are unheard of in China, where respect for tradition is more important than returning spirit to an authentic (but lost) past. Once hired to direct, Chen Shi-Zheng ran with Rockwell concept, in a direction that put him on a collision course with Kun opera. In Shanghai, he pointed of in interviews that Peony Pavilion was not written for performance as a Kun opera but as a chuan opera, which is not at all the same thing. Kun opera is a particular style of chuanqi— the most elega and formalized style in Tang's day—and Chen had in mind a more expansive recreation of Mir theater, which would capture both the liveliness of early chuanqi and the social and culturatmosphere of the time when it first became popular.

Chen's point, historically accurate, gave him more scope in realizing Rockwell's mandate. Whe resulted was a production that showcased the earthy humor of Tang's text and curtailed the stylized elegance favored in performances of Kun opera. In was a long and very bawdy scene sung by the sexually deformed Sister Stone ("Sorceress of the Dao"); out were many elaborately choreographed movements in "The Interrupted Dream," long familiar to Kun opera's fans. Qian Yi performed he famous solo aria ("Shanpoyang") while seated, instead of maneuvering her body around a table using prescribed movements designed to suggest—delicately—the anguish of frustrated desire. For a ghost tryst with her lover in "Disrupted Joy," she was seated on the lap of Wen Yuhang (as Liu Mengmei), posture inconceivable in a traditional staging of the scene.

Chen's decision to use other kinds of performances in his production lent variety to the stagin (part of his project to recreate Ming theatrical experiences for contemporary audiences), but elicite the "hodgepodge" label from his detractors, who were indignant at the claim (subsequently revoke that his was an "authentic" version of Peony Pavilion. Stilt-walking, skip-rope, and other children games contributed to the re'nao atmosphere in scene 8, and two pivotal scenes that feature L Mengmei with Bridal's portrait (24 and 26) were staged as pingtan (storytelling in Wu dialect musical accompaniment). Puppeteers performed in some of the military scenes, and an elabora funeral ceremony concluded the second segment. Realistic props and techniques were used, to the dismay of Kun opera purists. Prostitutes dumped real water from real wooden chamber pots into pond that fronted the stage, and funeral mourners wore hemp robes and burned paper objects braziers, including a troupe of opera actors fashioned of paper. These touches went over well in Network but not in Shanghai, where critics complained that Chen had undertaken a "confused artist project."

With hindsight, it is easy to see why the combined visions of John Rockwell and Chen Shi-Zhen met with growing resistance in Shanghai. What proved decisive was the overwhelmingly negative response to the "dregs" that Chen resurrected from Tang's text. Himself trained in huaguxi, a form Hunanese opera, Chen had taken on Kun opera's aesthetic dogma, which countenances common (stouches only if they are performed elegantly and looks askance at theater that is improvisational at unscripted. With the authorities in Shanghai, it cut no ice that most of Chen's "dregs" (Sister Stone the prostitutes, villagers at their games and much more) originated with Tang Xianzu; but a review New York's Chinese-language press, written after the show had had its successful run there in 1999 had this to say about their efforts to censor them:

The artistic achievement of the complete Peony Pavilion ... has become caught up in nationalistic feelings of contemporary Chinese who are both extremely proud and lacking in sel—confidence; this naturally has made an even-handed critique of the play more difficult. Opinion that criticizes portions of Peony Pavilion as vulgar, superstitious and feudal runs up against a serious contradiction. On the one hand it elevates Tang Xianzu's genius as high as the sky and frets that an insufficiently cultivated director and uncomprehending foreigners will misunderstand his labor of the heart, but these very critics are willing temporarily to forget that the person who wrote these lewd words was Tang Xianzu himself. Since everyone can agree about the artistic level of Peony Pavilion, and also agrees that a complete performance of it is a happy event, then no one has the right to decide for Tang Xianzu which parts of the stage language can be put before foreign audiences.⁵

The Peony Pavilion that Peter Sellars brought before foreign audiences had a contemporary look, be its underlying aesthetic had more in common with that of Kun opera than did Chen Shi-Zheng's. As consisting of translucent panels, mounted on wheels and inset with television monitors, adhere conceptually to a minimalist expressionism reminiscent of traditional Chinese staging technique. There were few props (Chen used more than a thousand); Sellars relied instead on colors (displayed on the television monitors and projected onto a backdrop), images (also projected on the television monitors), and choreographed movement to convey the layers of meaning in Tang's text. Known for the detailed attention he gives to the texts of operas he stages, Sellars's multilayered approach Tang's text also had more in common with Kun operatic staging techniques than did Chen's. In the terviews he spoke of his collaboration with Hua Wenyi and Tan Dun as motivated by a utopic vision of ideal love and impassioned youth. In this respect too his determination to elicity performances free of anything crass had more to do with the lyricism of Kun opera than Chen Sh Zheng's folksy naturalism did.

That said, other aspects of Sellars's direction were intended to deliver a shock and did, because the departed radically from classical Chinese opera's staging conventions. The first shock was delivered in Part One, when Hua Wenyi appeared onstage to perform the traditional Kun opera movement dressed in a yellow silk pantsuit and wearing Western-style make-up, lightly applied. An even greate shock was delivered at the beginning of Part Two by Tan Dun's music, which was composed alor principles similar to those for Kun opera (linear melodies, melismatic singing, repetition of music motifs), but performed by a band that was anchored by rock drums, Midi horns, and pipa rather the traditional clapper and flute.

Sellars's Bridal Du was Everywoman, not just the passionate but demure seventeenth-centure. Chinese young woman, but also a diva-like seductress in her ghostly incarnation (as performed by the soprano Ying Huang) and rebellious teenager (as portrayed in English by the Asian-American actress Lauren Tom). Sellars is fond of using contemporary elements in his productions of classic oper which can be jarring to sensibilities but are put there to "test the present against the past" and capture important dimensions of the work that are apt to be missed in conventional productions. It was fun watch these touches appear and disappear during rehearsals and over the course of the show's touch that did not make it out of rehearsal was to have Lauren Tom aim an invisible machine gun in the direction of Madam Du as she tells Liu Mengmei that "I owe you a debt greater than to my own fath and mother" (a vestige of Sellars's interest in how Tang portrays family relationships in the play another that did make it into performances was to have Joel de la Fuente as Liu Mengmei wear bandanna and carry a knapsack, modern substitutes for the traditional umbrella sported by sher actors on their travels.

A more penetrating example of this fondness for arresting juxtapositions was Sellars's decision cast English-speaking Asian-Americans in the lead roles (one of three leading pairs). This we dictated by a plan, subsequently abandoned, to perform the play on two evenings and include mo material from the final third of Tang's text (scenes 36—55). In these late scenes Liu Mengmei character comes to the fore; devoting an evening to them would rescue his character from the emasculating portrayal (as Sellars sees it) of highborn young males by the "fan-carrying" sheng act of Kun opera. Sellars was determined to give Liu Mengmei back his voice as frustrated student at free him to speak for disenfranchised youth, especially the Chinese youth who were brutally silence in Tian'anmen Square.

Sellars hoped that Liu Mengmei's voice would be heard by audiences in China, but for audiences Europe and North America he broke with his usual practice of staging operas in their origin language. In Part One, Lauren Tom's spoken English helped to bridge the language gap, as did Yin Huang and Lin Qiang's performance of Tan's music in Part Two, which was composed to accompan Birch's translation. After Vienna, surtitles were also used, selectively, for some of the most difficu arias. This manner of putting the Chinese text and English translation in dialogue with each oth differed from Chen Shi-Zheng's approach, which was to rely exclusively on surtitles. Chen and h collaborators created a new translation, which drew on Birch's at times but more often departed fro it. One goal, clearly, was to make the text more accessible, but this was achieved with a good deal mangling of Tang's beautiful but obscure language.

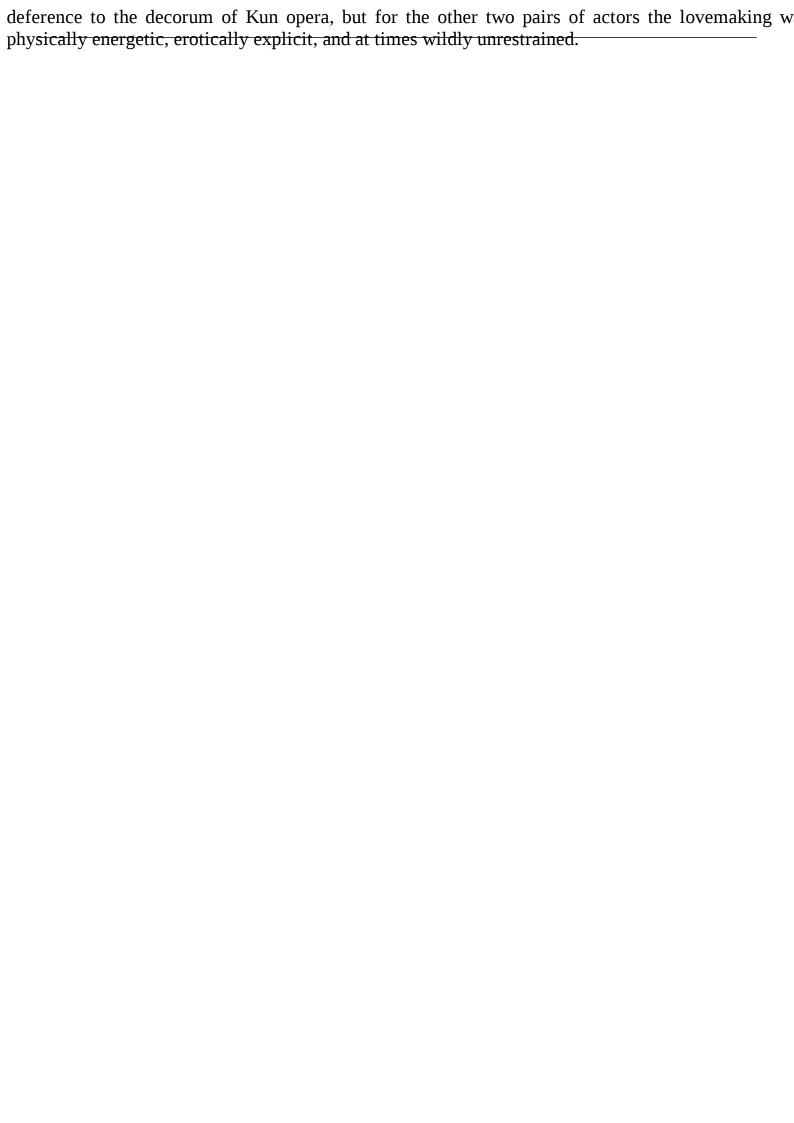

One example from scene 10 must suffice to make my point. Professor Birch has written elsewher of an aria from that scene, which is sung by the Flower Spirit as he witnesses the lovemaking that taking place offstage. This aria exemplifies the difficulty of Tang's language, which Professor Birch's translation (p. 49) captures well. Compare the English translation used by Chen, part of which I managed to scribble in my notes in New York:

Yin and Yang are so involved
See them writhe and squirm like worms.
But this meeting is a mirage
It is in their minds.
Their lust has stained my flower bed.
Rain petals down,
Or else she will never want to wake up from her dream.

Sellars believes that the opera house is "a good place to hold civic discussions about large-scalissues," and is committed to a politically engaged theater that asks its audience to notice the preserather than escape from it. His direction of Mozart operas and Bach cantatas discovers politic dimensions that have escaped the notice of other directors, and his reading of Professor Birch translation of The Peony Pavilion similarly has recovered political messages that have gone unnotice in China. Tang Xianzu's portrayal of Liu Mengmei is complicated enough to accommodate—barely-Sellars's interpretation of the character, but I regretted a missed opportunity, seized upon by Che Shi-Zheng, to bring out the humor that Tang Xianzu directs at the impoverished but brash student.

In the end, overt political messages fell victim to the collaborative nature of Sellars's project. He Wenyi was uncomfortable from the outset with this part of Sellars's plan, in part because she hope that the work would be performed in China and knew that thinly disguised references to the events 1989 would doom those chances. Tan Dun was more interested in the Daoist and Buddhist dimension of Tang's play, and it was these elements of Tan's score that Sellars responded to in his direction of Part Two, "Three Nights of Making Love to a Ghost."

The Peony Pavilion that had its world premiere in Vienna incorporated fragments from scen performed only rarely or never as zhezixi, especially in Part Two, which was built around a co sequence consisting of scenes 27, 28, 30, and 32. Even so, as noted above, Sellars's "lusciou beautiful, romantic evening" was more akin to Kun opera than the Chen Shi-Zheng marathon, which resurrected satire suppressed in the tradition of performing zhezixi. Sellars did depart from the offer saccharine depictions of lovemaking favored on the cleaned-up post-Liberation stage in China. Know for his dark depiction of sexuality in productions of Mozart operas, his depictions of lovemaking especially in Part Two, were not always pretty. Hua Wenyi, partnered by a modern dancer (Michael Schumacher), was exempted from portraying Bridal's sexuality in an overtly physical way out

Cultural Politics and Audience Reception

The politics that swirled around Chen Shi-Zheng's Peony probably had less to do with his reading of Tang's play than with the awkward position in which he found himself as an expatriate Chinest directing China's premier Kun opera troupe. Backed by powerful interests in Europe and Nor America but himself positioned as a folk artist in China's cultural field, Chen pitted himself again the cultural establishment in Shanghai. As a Hunanese with an American passport, he was doubly the outsider there, and brought with him a director-centered style acquired during his years of gradual study at New York University. The Peony Pavilion was enthusiastically received by audiences what attended two full dress rehearsals in Shanghai; displeasure with it was concentrated in government bureaus and in well connected circles of Kun opera experts in Shanghai and overseas. Bo constituencies rightly saw Chen's methods and aims as an assault on how cultural work is carried of in China, at least where Kun opera is concerned. Sellars, Hua, and Tan avoided their wrath by working only with artists based in North America.

What Sellars risked in his staging of the work—a risk he always takes—was incomprehension of hunique stage language, which makes demands of the audience by defamiliarizing theatric conventions. Sellars draws the viewer into the beauty of the illusion he and his actors create, as simultaneously distances him or her from it by exposing the technical apparatus of the theater as setting up dualities that compel intellectual engagement with what is happening onstage (and a lot happening). A Sellars opera is always, at one level, about opera, and appeals to people who enjoy theater at the cutting edge. It is not surprising that Chen's marathon version is the one that is still of tour; it is much more accessible than Sellars's intense and packed evening. 11

Where do these international productions fit in the long history of Kun opera, in which Peot Pavilion has had such a prominent place? Are they likely to have the stimulating effects on Chinestopera that their creators envisioned? In the short run, the collaboration with Lincoln Center and oth international backers of Chen Shi-Zheng's production has been disastrous for the Shanghai Kun Ope Troupe. It lost two of its most talented young performers, the dan actress Qian Yi and flautist Zho Ming, who resigned from the troupe so that they could go abroad and form the nucleus of Chen Shi Zheng's resurrected production. Despite a substantial infusion of money by the Chinese government mount the 7-hour 1999 production (reportedly 3 million RMB), morale at the troupe, especial among the younger performers, is low. When I went to Shanghai in the spring of 1999, rehearsals the 7-hour version were off limits, the doors of the troupe's theater were closed, and actors I has gotten to know on previous trips were inaccessible. What little I heard about the rehearsals we disheartening, and what I have read about the performances in Beijing suggests that the show was flop.

There were, however, some fine performances in the Beijing production and some interesting idea This production also used three pairs of actors to play the lead roles, combining the talents of two generations of performers at the troupe and recruiting a Beijing opera actress to portray Bridal as ghost. But the staging, which according to one account seemed inspired by karaoke and televisic variety shows, sounded tacky, especially by comparison with the elegant set of Sellars's production Neon peonies figured prominently (Sellars—more appropriately, in my view—made the plum the predominant floral image); there was a catwalk perhaps inspired by kabuki; fog machines; and multicolored lighting that pulsated at climactic moments such as the lovemaking duet in scene 10. The brigade of flower maidens—a traditional actor-inspired embellishment of scene 10 that has a presence in Tang's text—was also deployed for scenes 23 and 24, to give testimony to the underwork judge and present Liu Mengmei with Bridal's portrait. One way that this production clearly respondents to Chen Shi-Zheng's was the inclusion of scenes from the final third of the play in Part Three, but I Bao was the focal figure, not Liu Mengmei. One critic, no doubt inadvertantly, echoed Chen Shi Zheng when he admired how the Shanghai team had "extrapolated a swath of China's social history in their staging, and "restored the richness from every level of society contained in Tang Xianzu great work." 12

David Rolston, in a critique of the Lincoln Center marathon for Asian Theatre Journal, did not fin Chen's staging particularly innovative, but acknowledged that the audience response w "overwhelmingly positive" and hoped that the expense of such complete stagings of chuanqi wou not rule them out in the future. If and when it makes its way to Beijing (a possibility according to John Rockwell), Chen's production will likely get a warmer reception at the end of its world tour than it dat the beginning.

Peony Pavilion in the Study

It will take time to gauge the impact of these non-traditional stagings of Kun opera, but long before they were undertaken, study of Peony Pavilion in English was well underway. In China, enjoyment Tang's playtext as armchair drama has always been limited to the small number of readers capable understanding its difficult language; most who knew and loved the play did so from seeing it on the stage. Outside of China, however, Peony Pavilion has been enjoyed almost exclusively as literature, the following brief survey of critical literature about it will attest.

C. T. Hsia's pioneering essay "Time and the Human Condition in the Plays of T'ang Hsien-tsu remains a valuable introduction to Tang's dramatic oeuvre. Hsia was the first modern critic in an language to argue for philosophic consistency in Tang's plays, since in each of them he examine human feelings (qing) under the "tyranny of time." Hsia was responding to Chinese critics who four a disappointing break between Tang's affirmative depiction of love in his first three plays and h pessimistic treatment of it in the last two. In a chapter entitled "The Late Ming Moment," Wai-yee has also given a penetrating analysis of Tang's depiction of qing in his plays, in the context of the laming literati's fascination with dreams and the theater. Like Hsia, she finds consistency in Tang plays, even though the mood moves from comic reconciliation of passion and dispassion in Peoplevilion to greater detachment in Nankeji and Handanji, where human attachments are concerned.

Professor Birch is the other scholar who has introduced Tang's plays to the English-speaking worl in a series of articles, his translation of the complete play, and in a chapter devoted to Tang in ha aforementioned book on late Ming theater. Subsequent to this first wave of work, sever dissertations on Tang Xianzu were written, notably Cheng Pei-kai's study of the playwright's lift thought, and dramatic oeuvre, Wei Hua's study that contextualizes Tang's playwriting techniques with respect to Chinese ideas of harmony (he), and a dissertation by Chen Jingmei that looks at female readers of Peony Pavilion. 16

Dorothy Ko also devotes a chapter to female readers of Peony Pavilion in her influential study seventeenth-century women's lives and culture (a book that Sellars specifically mentioned to me f its impact on his thinking about the play). ¹⁷ Judith Zeitlin has contributed an article about a particul coterie of female readers married to the same man, who published their commentaries on the play an edition of Peony Pavilion commonly referred to as the "Three Wives" edition. Zeitlin has als examined Tang's depiction of Du Liang as ghost in several articles, which combine the perspectives literary critic, art historian, and scholar of Chinese medicine. ¹⁸

Two other studies foreground Tang Xianzu's interest in illusion and representation, a subject fire taken up by Wai-yee Li. Anne Burkus-Chasson examines the treatment of Bridal Du's self-portrait is "Disquieting Doubles: The Body in the Portrait and the Illusory Shape of the Self in The People Pavilion," and finds that the representation of the self in Bridal's portrait suggests the self transcience. Tina Lu grapples with similar questions regarding the stability of personal identity in his profoundly illuminating book Persons, Roles, and Minds: Identity in Peony Pavilion and Peace Blossom Fan. 20

Mine is the only study in English thus far that examines how Peony Pavilion has been performed. is centrally concerned with the tradition of staging it as a Kun opera, but two chapters are devoted the international productions discussed in this essay. Articles on these productions by Judith Zeitli David Rolston, and myself have also appeared in the issue of Asian Theatre Journal cited in note 1 Without a doubt, there is more to come.

Postscript

While revising this introdution for publication, I have learned, via John Rockwell, of a decision of cultural authorities in China to draw up a ten-year plan to save Kunqu, the "mother of tradition Chinese traditional opera," whose artists have dwindled in number to only 800 because of poor particle declining audience support, and defections to other forms of opera and popular music. An article Hong Kong's South China Morning Post, which appeared on September 10, 2001, reported that the plan came at the initiative of UNESCO, which in May of that year added Kun opera to its list masterpieces of oral and intangible human heritage. The article mentions Cai Zhengren, head of the Shanghai Kun Opera Troupe, who acknowledged that international recognition helped highlig concerns for Kunqu's plight.

It is too early to say how successful these rescue efforts will be, but without a doubt the international productions of Peony Pavilion discussed here have been instrumental in bringing the about.

Notes

- 1 Some arias, however, were abridged. This production originally had four co-sponsors (The Lincoln Center Festival, Festival d'Automne à Paris, The Sydney Festival, and The Hong Kong Arts Festival) once resurrected, its co-sponsors were Lincoln Center (with substantial help from Bloomberg News) and Festival d'Automne à Paris.
- 2 See both his Introduction and his chapter on Tang in Scenes for Mandarins: The Elite Theater of th Ming (New York: Columbia University Press, 1995).
- 3 Chuanqi ("southern drama") refers to a form of drama that originated in the south of China before the Yuan dynasty (1260—1368) and came to be referred to by that name c. 1400. By 1550 Kun opera was becoming the dominant musical style of chuanqi, and it would remain so until the emergence of Beijing opera in the eighteenth century. Unlike zaju ("northern drama"), which it supplanted, chuanq are very long, and Peony Pavilion's fifty-five scenes make it among the longest.
- 4 The above account draws from two chapters in my book, Peony Pavilion Onstage: Four Centuries the Career of a Chinese Drama (Ann Arbor: Center for Chinese Studies, The University of Michigan 2001). Jiang Jurong's concise performance history of the play, "Mudan ting yanchu xiaoshi" (A shor performance history of Peony Pavilion), was published as a fifteen-page insert in Shanghai xiju, no. (June 1998).
- 5 John Rockwell lays out the history of the Lincoln Center production in "Love, Death and Resurrection, in and of The Peony Pavilion," Kaikodo Journal 15 (spring 2000): 10—24. I have written an account of Chen's production, based largely on coverage of it in the Shanghai press, in chapter 7 of my book. The reporter quoted is Lin Qianxiu, "Mudan ting luomu shengzhong zhengyi wei pingxi" (Midst Applause as the Curtain Falls on The Peony Pavilion, Controversy Has Not Yet Quieted Down), Shijie ribao, 12 July 1999.
- 6 This account is based on chapter 6 of my book. Quotations from other items are cited below.
- 7 See David Littlejohn, "What Peter Sellars Did to Mozart," in The Ultimate Art: Essays Around and About Opera (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992), 142.
- 8 Birch's discussion of the Flower Spirit's aria comes at the beginning of his chapter devoted to The Peony Pavilion in Scenes for Mandarins.
- 9 See Mark Pappenheim, "Shock Tactics," BBC Music Magazine, March 2001, 42, and Littlejohn, "What Peter Sellars Did to Mozart," 142.

sample content of The Peony Pavilion: Mudan ting, Second Edition

- download online I Was Told There'd Be Cake: Essays for free
- It's Our Turn to Eat: The Story of a Kenyan Whistle-Blower pdf, azw (kindle), epub
- Promote Yourself: The New Rules for Career Success pdf, azw (kindle), epub, doc, mobi
- Mother Land for free
- http://honareavalmusic.com/?books/Casino-Infernale--Secret-Histories--Book-7-.pdf
- http://serazard.com/lib/lt-s-Our-Turn-to-Eat--The-Story-of-a-Kenyan-Whistle-Blower.pdf
- http://deltaphenomics.nl/?library/Promote-Yourself--The-New-Rules-for-Career-Success.pdf
- http://redbuffalodesign.com/ebooks/Rational-Universalism--The-Second-Directive--A-New-View-of-Life-After-Death-and-Our-Spiritual-Evolution.pdf